As Assistant Commissioner and Chief Financial Officer of the U.S. Customs Service, I served as the key advisor to the Commissioner on all matters relating financial and resource programs, construction and procurement. I directed the formulation, presentation and execution of the Customs Service budget, obligation of funds and employment ceilings, managed annual appropriations, revenue, procurement, real property and other assets in over 600 locations worldwide.

As the Chief Financial Officer for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, I was the principal advisor to the Director on all financial matters, and responsible for all financial planning, programming, budgeting, investment, and contracting, establishing standards and procedures worldwide.

Question. Do you believe that there are any actions that you need to take to enhance your ability to perform the duties of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller)?

Answer. If confirmed, I will quickly identify any shortcomings in my knowledge regarding the many challenging issues facing the Department of the Navy through discussions with subject matter experts within the Navy and the broader Department of Defense.

MAJOR CHALLENGES

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges that confront the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Financial Management and Comptroller?

Answer. In sum, (1) balancing the budget while ensuring requirements of the warfighter are met; (2) ensuring the financial management workforce is recruited, retained, trained and developed; (3) ensuring the financial statements within the Navy and Marine Corps are audit-ready.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. Standing alone, the challenges I enumerated above are considerable. In the context of the constraints of the Budget Control Act of 2011, the challenges are even more daunting and can only be accomplished through close coordination with the Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller), the Secretary and Under Secretary of the Navy, and the Navy's Service Chiefs.

Question. What do you consider to be the most significant problems in the performance of the functions of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Financial Management and Comptroller?

Answer. I am aware that the specific impacts of furlough associated with the Department's effort to manage the effects sequestration have had a negative impact on the performance and functions of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Financial Management and Comptroller.

Question. If confirmed, what management actions and timelines would you establish to address these problems?

Answer. Specific solutions, which in turn would determine the timeline, must be the product of collaboration with the Office of the Secretary of Defense and Congress. If confirmed, I will do everything in my power to find solutions to the problems and/or to mitigate the impacts.

PRIORITIES

Question. If confirmed, what broad priorities would you establish in terms of issues which must be addressed by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller)?

Answer. My priorities are aligned to what I perceive as the Department's greatest challenges. In sum, (1) balancing the budget while ensuring requirements of the warfighter are met; (2) ensuring the financial management workforce is recruited, retained, trained and developed; (3) ensuring the financial statements within the Navy and Marine Corps are audit-ready.

CIVILIAN AND MILITARY ROLES IN THE NAVY BUDGET PROCESS

Question. What is your understanding of the division of responsibility between the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller) and the senior military officers responsible for budget matters in Office of the Chief of Naval Operations and headquarters, Marine Corps, in making program and budget decisions, including the preparation of the Navy Program Objective Memorandum, the annual budget submission, and the Future Years Defense Program?

Answer. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller) is responsible for all budget matters within the Department. If I am confirmed, the senior military officers, including the Director of the office of Budget, would serve as principal military advisors to me in my capacity to oversee the development of the Departments Program Objective Memorandum, annual budget submission, and Future Years Defense Program.

FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT AND ACCOUNTABILITY

Question. DOD's financial management deficiencies have been the subject of many audit reports over the past 10 or more years. Despite numerous strategies and initiatives, problems with financial management and data continue.

What do you consider to be the top financial management issues that must be addressed by the Department of the Navy over the next 5 years?

Answer. The top financial management issues include: (1) balancing the budget while ensuring requirements of the warfighter are met; (2) ensuring the financial management workforce is recruited, retained, trained and developed; (3) ensuring the financial statements within the Navy and Marine Corps are audit-ready.

Question. If confirmed, how would you plan to ensure that progress is made toward improved financial management in the Navy?

Answer. If confirmed, I commit to working closely with my civilian counterparts and military leadership within the Department of the Navy and the Office of the Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) to properly allocate resources, to improve our systems and processes, to recruit and retain the right workforce and to achieve auditable financial statements.

Question. If confirmed, what private business practices, if any, would you advocate for adoption by the Department of Defense and the Department of the Navy?

Answer. At this time, I am not aware of any private business practices that I would advocate for adoption. If confirmed, I will consider best financial practices from within the private sector and other well-run Federal or State agencies.

Question. What are the most important performance measurements you would use, if confirmed, to evaluate changes in the Navy's financial operations to determine if its plans and initiatives are being implemented as intended and anticipated results are being achieved?

Answer. The timely distribution and allocation of funds; the timely obligation of funds; balance of funds with the Treasury, the percentage of invoices that are paid in timely fashion, the amount of interest penalties paid, and the timeliness of financial data are all performance measures that I believe require close monitoring. If confirmed, I would track these metrics along with the scheduled timelines previously established within the Department of the Navy. I would use these indices to evaluate where and how to make any adjustments.

Question. Section 1003 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010 establishes an objective for the Department of Defense to ensure that its financial statements are validated as ready for audit by not later than September 30, 2017. The provision requires the Department to establish interim goals, including objectives for each of the Military Departments.

What is your understanding of the status of Navy efforts to ensure that its financial statement is validated as ready for audit by the statutory deadline?

Answer. I understand that the Department has a Financial Improvement Plan and is making progress toward achieving auditable financial statements. However, a substantial amount of work remains to be completed if the Department is to improve its business processes and systems. Difficult issues must be addressed, including the valuation of major weapon systems and equipment. While I support the 2017 goal, I have not had the opportunity to review the plan and at this time could not inform you of my confidence level that the September 30, 2017 goal is achievable.

Question. What additional steps do you believe the Department of the Navy should take to ensure that it meets the 2017 deadline?

Answer. Maintaining a steady focus and commitment on all Department efforts enabling audit readiness will be critical to success in 2017 and lay the foundation for a sustainable audit environment well into the future. If confirmed, I will review the objectives that have been prepared and determine whether they appear to be reasonable and effective.

Question. What is the role of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller) in this effort?

Answer. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller) provides the overall leadership within the Department to achieve auditable financial statements. However, the ability to produce auditable statements is influenced by all the business operations and processes within the Department. If confirmed, I will work with the civilian and military leadership, process owners and the Office of the Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) to meet the requirement for auditable financial statements.

Question. If confirmed, how will you work with the Chief Management Officer of the Department of the Navy and the Navy Business Transformation Office in this effort?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Chief Management Officer of the Department of the Navy and the Navy Business Transformation Office to ensure that budget, finance, and accounting operations are considered in changes to Department of the Navy business processes. I will provide leadership and advice in the financial management functional area and ensure that those efforts are aligned with Department of Defense priorities to achieve and sustain auditable financial statements.

SUPPLEMENTAL FUNDING AND ANNUAL BUDGETING

Question. Since September 11, 2001, the Department of Defense has paid for much of the cost of ongoing military operations through supplemental appropriations, and the fiscal year 2014 budget included a full-year request for overseas contingency operations.

What are your views regarding the use of supplemental appropriations to fund the cost of ongoing military operations?

Answer. The longstanding practice of using supplemental appropriation requests to fund contingency operations has allowed the administration and Congress to specifically identify and review the cost of military operations above those costs necessary to provide for ongoing national security activities. While this has been an added burden to the resource process, it should continue to diminish as operations continue to wind down. I believe this method has been helpful in allowing these two branches of government to fulfill their respective roles and responsibilities.

BUDGET CONTROL ACT AND SEQUESTRATION

Question. Due to the 2011 Budget Control Act (BCA) sequestration is cutting the enacted fiscal year 2013 defense budget by more than $40 billion and, without changes to the BCA, sequestration will cut the DOD budget request by approximately $52 billion.

What are your views regarding the Budget Control Act and sequestration of budgetary resources?

Answer. The BCA is law until the President and Congress negotiate an alternative solution. I agree with the general observations made by those involved that ensuring compliance with BCA implementation requirements has produced significant challenges to effective and efficient DOD operations. I am also aware that the possibility exists for implementation of the BCA in fiscal year 2014 if the law remains in place.

If confirmed, it will be my responsibility to advise the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations and the Commandant of the Marine Corps how best to implement BCA reductions to lessen the adverse impact that sequestration will have on the Naval enterprise and on national security.

Question. What is your view of the impact that sequestration in fiscal year 2014 and beyond would have in the Department of the Navy?

Answer. At this point, I am unfamiliar with the specific effects of sequestration in fiscal year 2014 and beyond for the Department of the Navy, but I generally understand and personally believe that sequestration will in all likelihood, dramatically, and in very short order, degrade readiness and adversely affect the health and morale of the all volunteer force. If confirmed, it will be my responsibility to advise the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations and the Commandant of the Marine Corps how best to implement BCA reductions to lessen the adverse impact that sequestration will have on the Naval enterprise and on national security.

FURLOUGH OF NAVY PERSONNEL

Question. It was previously reported that the Navy believed it could structure its available fiscal year 2013 funding to avoid having any furlough days for Navy civilian workers. However, other parts of DOD were not in a position to do the same for their own civilian workers and, in the end, DOD's solution was to have all DOD civilian workers, including Navy civilian workers, take up to 11 furlough days.

What is the impact on the Navy's various budget accounts, and on Navy readiness, of the DOD decision to require Navy civilian workers to be furloughed for up to 11 days?

Answer. While I am aware that the CNO and Commandant had to make very tough choices, I do not have insight into the DOD decision process that required them to direct the DON to furlough. If confirmed, I will be able to study these impacts further and provide you greater insight in the future.

Question. Now that the Navy has finally determined the impact of the March 1, 2013, sequester on the Navy's fiscal year 2013 accounts, was the impact of the sequester on the Navy along the lines of what Navy and DOD officials originally expected and forecast?

Answer. I do not have insight into how the DON is implementing sequestration versus its original forecasts. If confirmed, I will be able to review fiscal year 2013 execution to assess the funal impact of sequestration.

Question. What does the experience with the sequestration of fiscal year 2013 accounts tell us about the potential impact of sequestration later this year or early next year on the Navy's fiscal year 2014 accounts?

Answer. While the President's budget submitted for fiscal year 2014 did not assume the impacts of sequestration, it is my understanding that the Department has been directed to prepare for the possibility of sequestration continuing into fiscal year 2014. I am not aware of any specifics.

AUTHORIZATION FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE PROGRAMS

Question. Do you believe that an authorization pursuant to section 114 of title 10, U.S.C., is necessary before funds for operations and maintenance, procurement, research and development, and military construction may be made available for obligation by the Department of Defense?

Answer. Yes. Furthermore, if confirmed, I will respect the views and prerogatives of the Department's oversight committees.

LABORATORY DIRECTED RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT (LDRD)

Question. Section 219 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2009 authorized the Secretary of Defense, in consultation with the Secretaries of the military departments, to "establish mechanisms under which the director of a defense laboratory may use an amount of funds equal to not more than three per cent of all funds available to the defense laboratory . . . to fund innovative basic and applied research and several other purposes at these laboratories." Similar to the model of the Department of Energy LDRD program, the purpose of section 219 is to provide funding and discretion to the Navy's laboratory and technical center directors, to support the continued infusion of new ideas that support Navy missions, and in particular to authorize the directors to exercise some discretion in investing in promising technologies and other laboratory activities.

What should the role and authority of the Navy comptroller's organization be in implementing this statute?

Answer. I agree that the Navy's laboratory and technical centers are vital to supporting Navy's mission. The Navy Comptroller's role in implementing this statute is to develop a budget strategy consistent with the congressional direction, to ensure the implementation and execution of this authority is done in accordance with the law, and to ensure appropriate financial and accounting methods are in place to support this program. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department's budget strategy and policies are in accordance with the law.

Question. How would you intend to enable the laboratory director's discretion over such funding to support its effective implementation, similar to the Department of Energy model?

Answer. At this point, I do not have the necessary familiarity with the Department of Energy model, but if confirmed, I will work with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Research, Development and Acquisition) and the Office of the Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) to ensure effective and successful implementation.

BUDGETING TO ADDRESS OPERATIONAL NEEDS AND TECHNOLOGICAL OPPORTUNITIES

Question. The Services often are often faced with situations in which an urgent operational need or a new technological opportunity arises on a timeline that is inconsistent with the relatively slow budgeting and programming process.

How should the Navy change its processes so that its budgeting, programming, and planning processes are more adaptable to emerging operational needs and technological opportunities?

Answer. At this point, I do not have the necessary familiarity with current processes to answer this question, but if confirmed, I will review all current processes to see if there are adjustments to be made that make us more adaptable to emerging operational needs and technological opportunities.

IN-KIND MILITARY CONSTRUCTION

Question. The committee released a report on April 15, 2013, titled "Inquiry into U.S. Costs and Allied Contributions to Support the U.S. Military Presence Overseas." Among other things, the committee's inquiry found that in-kind payments from Germany, South Korea, and Japan have been used to fund questionable military construction projects. The committee's version of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 includes a provision (section 2801) that would require that future military construction projects funded using in-kind payments pursuant to bilateral agreements with partner nations be submitted for congressional authorization in the Military Construction Authorization Act.

If confirmed, how would you ensure that in-kind payments are utilized only for identified U.S. priorities to offset costs that the Department of the Navy would otherwise pay with appropriated funds?

Answer. At this point, I do not have a complete understanding of the prevalence of this method of funding nor the specific details of its prior use within the Department of the Navy. Upon receipt of this question, I reviewed the Navy-specific sections in the referenced report. If confirmed, I will ensure that gaining an understanding this practice will become one of my immediate short-term priorities and that my understanding is placed in the context of other legal authorities and constraints.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes, I agree.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller)?

Answer. Yes, I agree.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes, I agree.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes, I agree.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CLAIRE MCCASKILL

BONUSES PAID TO SENIOR EXECUTIVE SERVICE EMPLOYEES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

1. Senator MCCASKILL. Dr. Rabern, in 2011, the Department of the Navy (DON) was among the few Federal agencies that awarded, on average, more than one bonus per Senior Executive Service (SES) employee. The Navy was also one of the five agencies with the highest average spending on SES bonuses, awarding more than $13,000 in bonuses per SES employee. If confirmed, will you share with this committee the status of bonuses paid to SES employees in the Navy in fiscal year 2012, including the total amount paid, the amount per SES employee, the number and percentage of SES employees receiving bonuses, and whether any SES employees received aggregate pay above the statutory limit of $230,700?

Dr. RABERN. Yes, if confirmed I will share with the committee the status of SES bonuses in the Navy.

2. Senator MCCASKILL. Dr. Rabern, will you commit to reviewing, and changing, if necessary, the metrics used to determine the performance level of SES employees, and provide information to this committee regarding the progress and results of your review?

Dr. RABERN. Yes, if confirmed I commit to reviewing the metrics used to determine the performance level of SES employees and, if necessary, will propose changes to the appropriate DON, Department of Defense (DOD), or Office of Personnel Management officials.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY AUDIT

3. Senator MCCASKILL. Dr. Rabern, Public Law 111–84, the National Defense Authorization Act of 2010, enacted October 28, 2009, requires auditable DOD financial statements by September 30, 2017. While progress is being made, the current Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller) acknowledged several material weaknesses related to the Navy's business processes and systems that prevent the Navy from producing auditable financial statements. Given the numerous weaknesses that have been identified, do you believe that the Navy will be in a position to keep up its end of the bargain in getting DOD to a point where it can be audited in the next 4 years?

Dr. RABERN. I understand that the Department has a Financial Improvement Plan and is making progress toward achieving auditable financial statements. However, I have not had the opportunity to review the plan and at this time could not inform you of my confidence level that the September 30, 2017, goal is achievable.

4. Senator MCCASKILL. Dr. Rabern, what gives you confidence that the Navy can meet the 2017 goal?

Dr. RABERN. Even though I support the 2017 goal, I have not had the opportunity to review the plan and at this time could not inform you of my confidence level that the September 30, 2017, goal is achievable.

5. Senator MCCASKILL. Dr. Rabern, on July 18, the DOD OIG released a report raising concerns about the Navy's use of the Navy Enterprise Resource Planning System (Navy ERP). The DOD OIG found that while the Navy has identified a material weakness in the its ability to account for Navy military equipment, and has identified Navy ERP as the solution, the Navy is in fact not using Navy ERP to account for this equipment. Rather, the Navy continues to use what the DOD OIG called "inefficient manual processes" in its accounting procedures. The Navy spent $870 million to develop and implement Navy ERP, and the Navy needs to be fully utilizing its capabilities. If confirmed, will you take a close look at this issue to ensure the Navy is appropriately using the resources at its disposal to be accountable and achieve its audit-ready obligations?

Dr. RABERN. If confirmed, I commit to working closely with my civilian counterparts and military leadership within the Department of the Navy and the Office of the Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) to properly allocate and account for resources, to improve our systems and processes, and to achieve auditable financial statements.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOE MANCHIN III

CONTRACTOR SALARIES

6. Senator MANCHIN. Dr. Rabern, since I've gotten to the Senate, I've been asking DOD how many contractors there are, and how much money they make. I still don't have an answer. What I do know is that contractors can make up to $763,000—funded by the taxpayers. If we do nothing, that figure will rise to nearly $1 million this year. What is your opinion on paying our contractors nearly $1 million?

Dr. RABERN. In my experience, government contracts generally do not specify a number of personnel required to satisfy the terms; rather, the government contracts for performance of a specific set of tasks, objectives, or services. I do not have in depth knowledge of the salaries paid to Department of Navy contractor personnel. If confirmed, I commit to looking at this issue and providing informed recommendations to senior leadership of the Department of the Navy regarding the efficient and effective allocation of resources consistent with the national security priorities of the President and the Secretary of Defense.

7. Senator MANCHIN. Dr. Rabern, would it have an impact on the readiness of the military if we brought that figure to a more reasonable amount?

Dr. RABERN. I do not have sufficient information to respond to this question at this time. If confirmed, I commit to looking at this issue and providing informed recommendations to senior leadership of the Department of the Navy regarding the efficient and effective allocation of resources consistent with the national security priorities of the President and the Secretary of Defense.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

PRIORITIES

8. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rabern, do you believe the Navy's purchase last year of 450,000 gallons of biofuels for $12 million using scarce operations and maintenance (O&M) funds at a cost of over $26 a gallon is an efficient, effective use of O&M funds and is an example of proper stewardship?

Dr. RABERN. I am not familiar with the details of this purchase and cannot provide an opinion on the matter at this time. If confirmed, I will ensure that we develop and execute balanced budgets that are the result of thorough and timely analysis and in support of the goals and initiatives that Secretary Mabus has established for the Department.

FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT AND CONTROL

9. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rabern, based on your extensive experience in financial management do you believe it is prudent for any Federal agency to submit their annual budget submission without including consideration for the effects of the Budget Control Act?

Dr. RABERN. I have not been associated with any budget submissions since passage of the Budget Control Act of 2011, but I believe that agency budgets should be submitted consistent with the requirements and constraints of the law.

DOD FINANCIAL ACCOUNTING AND AUDITS

10. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rabern, if confirmed, what is your understanding of your role in finally establishing the level of audit readiness that is required by law?

Dr. RABERN. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller) provides the overall leadership within the Department to achieve auditable financial statements. However, the ability to produce auditable statements is influenced by all the business operations and processes within the Department.

If confirmed, I will work with the civilian and military leadership, process owners, and the Office of the Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) to meet the requirement for auditable financial statements.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

NAVY FACILITY BACKLOG

11. Senator AYOTTE. Dr. Rabern, section 2476 of title 10 requires 6 percent of annual capital investment for certain depots. Are you aware of this requirement and will you commit to follow that requirement?

Dr. RABERN. I am familiar with this requirement, and if confirmed, I commit to working with the Chief of Naval Operations, Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Assistant Secretaries of the Navy for Research, Development, and Acquisition and Energy, Installations and Environment to ensure that whatever funding may be available for shore infrastructure, including shipyards and depots, is allocated appropriately to meet mission critical needs.

DOD AUDIT

12. Senator AYOTTE. Dr. Rabern, with DOD facing significant budget reductions, it is more important than ever that we have reliable financial data so we can differentiate between necessary budget cuts and those that would harm our troops and endanger our national security. Do I have your commitment that the Navy will meet the 2014 statement of budgetary resources deadline, as required by the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013?

Dr. RABERN. If confirmed, I am committed to maintaining a steady focus on all Department efforts towards clean audit opinions and critical to that success is assertion in 2014. If confirmed, I will review the objectives that have been prepared and determine whether they appear to be reasonable and effective.

13. Senator AYOTTE. Dr. Rabern, is the Navy creating systems and processes that will be repeatable so that we avoid expending great effort to ensure the Navy is audit ready—only to find that the Navy is unable to sustain these efforts over the long-term?

Dr. RABERN. A crucial step in the DON plan to achieve audit success is laying the foundation for a sustainable audit environment well into the future. If confirmed, I will review the objectives that have been prepared and determine whether they appear to be reasonable and effective.

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the Military Departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. I believe the Goldwater-Nichols defense reforms have been very effective, and I am not aware of the need for any modifications.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. I am not aware of the need for any modifications to Goldwater-Nichols, but if confirmed, I will work with the Secretary of the Navy and Under Secretary of the Navy on any proposed changes that pertain to Navy energy, installations or the environment.

DUTIES

Question. What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment?

Answer. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Energy, Installations, and Environment) formulates policy and procedures for the effective management of the Navy and Marine Corps energy programs, real property, housing and other facilities; environmental protection ashore and afloat; and, safety and occupational health for both military and civilian personnel. This position is also responsible for the timely completion of closures and realignments of installations under base closure laws.

Question. What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform these duties?

Answer. During my 35-year career with the U.S. Navy I served as a naval aviator, test pilot, aircraft carrier commanding officer, and national security strategist. My capstone assignment with the Navy was as Deputy Chief of Naval Operations for Warfare Requirements and Programs at the Pentagon, where I oversaw the development of future U.S. Navy capabilities. In my previous operational leadership roles, I commanded the U.S. Third Fleet.

In my civilian career I have served as co-chairman of the Center for Naval Analyses (CNA) Military Advisory Board advising policy makers on the nexus of energy and national security, and as an international security senior fellow at the Rocky Mountain Institute. I served on the Steering Committee of the Energy Future Coalition, as a member of the United States Energy Security Council, and as a member of the Bipartisan Policy Center Energy Board. I previously worked with Battelle Memorial Institute, where I was a corporate officer and led the energy, transportation, and environment division. While serving as the CEO and President of the American Council On Renewable Energy (ACORE), I led the advancement of the organization's mission of building a secure and prosperous America with clean, renewable energy.

Question. Do you believe that there are actions you need to take to enhance your ability to perform the duties of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment?

Answer. I am confident that there is much that I can do to enhance my abilities to perform the duties of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Energy, Installations and Environment). If confirmed, I will seek to learn more about the individual programs and facilities within my purview, as well as the different requirements associated with military construction. Using my significant managerial experience, I would expect to parlay the expertise and views of those within the Department of the Navy, as well as those of the Secretary of Defense and the other military departments, to develop efficient and effective policies for the Department's use of our installations and the environment. If confirmed, I will also seek and listen to the advice and counsel of Congress, and the communities in which we operate, to find ways to be the best steward of the Department of the Navy's properties.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what duties and functions do you expect that the Secretary of the Navy would prescribe for you?

Answer. If confirmed, I would expect the Secretary of the Navy to prescribe the duties and functions stated above. Additionally, I would expect that the Secretary will request that I rely upon my years of operational experience to assist him in developing and implementing programs to meet the energy goals he laid out for the Department.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges that confront the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment?

Answer. There are many significant challenges confronting the next Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Energy, Installations, and Environment). The most significant of these includes the Guam military construction projects, ensuring that the Department of the Navy has the right infrastructure at the right time for the right cost to support the country's warfighters and their families, and establishing the programs necessary to meet the Department's energy goals.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I plan to work closely with Congress, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Commandant of the Marine Corps, the Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Installations and Environment), as well as other governmental and nongovernmental organizations to devise solutions to address these challenges and maximize successful outcomes for all parties involved.

Question. What do you consider to be the most significant problems in the performance of the functions of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment?

Answer. I am not aware of any significant problems in the performance of the functions of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations and Environment.

Question. If confirmed, what management actions and timelines would you establish to address these problems?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Secretary and the Under Secretary of the Navy to develop a strategic plan to address significant problems that arise.

PRIORITIES

Question. If confirmed, what broad priorities would you establish in terms of issues which must be addressed by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment?

Answer. If confirmed, I will establish priorities consistent with those of the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the Secretary of the Navy. In broad terms, I will assist the Secretary of the Navy in meeting the energy goals he laid out for the Department, work closely with Members of Congress and State and local officials and the public to remain fully transparent when considering projects and processes with environmental impacts, and seek to allocate funding to develop the right infrastructure at the right time at the right cost to support our warfighters and their families.

Question. Do you have any specific plans to help improve the quality of life for Navy and Marine Corps families who are under considerable strain as a result of repeated deployments?

Answer. Not at this time, but as a 35 year Navy veteran, I am very aware of the tremendous sacrifices made by Navy and Marine Corps families. If confirmed, I will be committed to identifying and implementing quality of life initiatives.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment has responsibility for, among other things, enhancing energy security, construction and maintenance of installations; family housing, and environmental protection.

In the competition for resources inherent in the Defense Department budget process, how do you believe funding for these various responsibilities should be balanced?

Answer. These important programs are not mutually exclusive. Although they would certainly compete for the same limited resources, the development of these programs must be done in conjunction with each other. All of these programs must work hand-in-hand to further the strategic vision and goals of the Secretary of the Navy.

MILITARY CONSTRUCTION

Question. What would be your highest priorities, if confirmed, for allocating military construction (MILCON) funding for the Department of the Navy over the next several years?

Answer. If confirmed, I will seek to allocate funding to develop the right infrastructure at the right time at the right cost to support our warfighters and their families.

Question. Are you concerned that overseas initiatives, including the realignment of marines in the Pacific, will consume an increasing share of the Department of the Navy MILCON budget—thereby crowding out other programs such as housing and quality of life programs for sailors, marines, and their families?

Answer. Although we find ourselves in a challenging fiscal environment, I am cautiously optimistic that we will be able to meet all of these challenges and fund the right investments at the right time.

GUAM

Question. The committee remains concerned about the plans for the relocation of marines from Okinawa to other locations in the Pacific, and specifically, the affordability, sustainability and operational viability of those plans. In April of last year, the United States and Japan announced a new plan for the marines—called the "distributed laydown"—that envisions about 4,500 in Guam, about 2,500 in Australia, on a rotational basis, and some number in Hawaii. The committee's version of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 would continue a prohibition on the use of U.S. or Japanese funds to implement the realignment of Marine Corps forces from Okinawa until several conditions, including the development of a master plan for the laydown of marines in Guam and Hawaii, are met.

What is your understanding of the status of the Department of the Navy's plans for the realignment of Marine Corps forces from Okinawa?

Answer. I have not had an opportunity to develop a thorough understanding of the issues associated with the relocation of marines and their families from Okinawa to Guam. From the information that I have seen at this point, I understand the Supplemental Environmental Impact Statement (SEIS) and associated supporting studies are being prepared and that the DON anticipates that the Draft SEIS will be formally released for public comment in early 2014 with a Record of Decision expected in early 2015.

Question. What is your understanding of the current estimated cost to implement the realignment of Marine Corps forces from Okinawa?

Answer. Although I am not familiar with the official estimates, I understand that the Department of Defense is identifying and incorporating comprehensive cost estimates as they become available upon completion of necessary environmental planning documents and the conclusion of host-nation discussions on cost-sharing.

Question. When will the Department of the Navy provide the Senate Armed Services Committee with the Guam Master Plan so that the costs and timing of construction contracts for the entire project will be totally transparent?

Answer. My understanding is that the Department will be able to provide the Guam Master Plan after the Draft SEIS is released, sometime next year.

FUTENMA AIR STATION

Question. The committee understands that Futenma Marine Corps Air Station on Okinawa will require significant investments to maintain mission capability and readiness. In fact, the marines estimate that current repair and construction demands will cost about $180 million.

What is your understanding of the current plan to fund the nearly $180 million in repairs and construction?

Answer. My understanding is that the Department has been working with the Government of Japan (GOJ) on a replacement facility for MCAS Fuetenma. In the interim, the Department is working with the GOJ to fund the repairs necessary to support operations at the base.

BASE CLOSURE AND REALIGNMENTS

Question. The Department of Defense has requested another Base Realignment and Closure (BRAC) round.

Do you believe another BRAC round is necessary? If so, why?

Answer. I believe it is prudent to objectively assess our shore assets and make informed decisions about potentially excess infrastructure. A new assessment would allow the Department to take into account changes to the shore/platform interfaces as our weapons systems capabilities, testing, and how we employ them have evolved over time.

Question. If Congress were to authorize a another BRAC round, what is your understanding of the responsibilities of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment in formulating BRAC recommendations and implementing the decisions of the BRAC Commission?

Answer. If confirmed, I will serve as the Department of the Navy's primary senior leader charged with meeting our BRAC responsibilities. Accordingly, I will work closely with Congress, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Commandant of the Marine Corps, the Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Installations and Environment), as well as other governmental and nongovernmental organizations as appropriate in order to execute these statutory requirements.

Question. If confirmed and if Congress were to authorize another BRAC round, how would you go about setting priorities for infrastructure reduction and consolidation within the Department of the Navy?

Answer. If confirmed and Congress were to authorize a BRAC, I would first seek to gain a thorough understanding of the extent of the Department's footprint ashore and how it supports the warfighter. I would then ensure we have the necessary tools and resources to evaluate what exists in terms of military value. I would also work with my counterparts in the other Services for opportunities to consolidate or colocate functions, where it makes sense.

Question. If confirmed and if Congress were to authorize another BRAC round, what is you understanding of the responsibilities of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment in working with local communities with respect to property disposal?

Answer. I believe that the Department of the Navy is responsible for working with local communities to ensure an orderly and transparent transition from public ownership to private ownership.

Question. It has been noted repeatedly that the 2005 BRAC round resulted in major and unanticipated implementation costs and saved far less money than originally estimated.

What is your understanding of why such cost growth and lower realized savings have occurred?

Answer. I am not familiar with the events leading cost growth in implementing BRAC 2005.

Question. How do you believe such issues could be addressed in a future BRAC round?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure that the program is implemented with management controls in place to help curtail excessive cost growth.

OVERSEAS FACILITIES

Question. Do you believe the Department of the Navy currently maintains excess infrastructure overseas? If so, how would you seek to address this issue?

Answer. I have not had an opportunity to study Navy overseas force structure, however, if confirmed I will work with the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Commandant to make sure Navy infrastructure is aligned with force structure to support naval operations.

IN-KIND MILITARY CONSTRUCTION

Question. The committee released a report on April 15, 2013, titled "Inquiry into U.S. Costs and Allied Contributions to Support the U.S. Military Presence Overseas." Among other things, the committee's inquiry found that in-kind payments from Germany, South Korea, and Japan have been used to fund questionable military construction projects. The committee's version of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 includes a provision (section 2801) that would require that future military construction projects funded using in-kind payments pursuant to bilateral agreements with partner nations be submitted for congressional authorization in the Military Construction Authorization Act.

If confirmed, how would you ensure that in-kind payments are utilized only for identified U.S. priorities to offset costs that the Department of the Navy would otherwise pay with appropriated funds?

Answer. I do not have a complete understanding of this method of funding within the Navy but I have reviewed sections of the report mentioned in this question and I understand the issue and concerns. If confirmed, I will make certain I will work with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller) and others within the Department to respond to this question more completely.

INVESTMENT IN INFRASTRUCTURE

Question. Witnesses appearing before the committee in the past have testified that the military services under-invest in both the maintenance and recapitalization of facilities and infrastructure compared to private industry standards. Decades of under-investment in DOD installations has led to substantial backlogs of facility maintenance activities, created substandard living and working conditions, and made it harder to take advantage of new technologies that could increase productivity.

If confirmed, what recommendations would you have for restoring and preserving the quality of our infrastructure?

Answer. If confirmed, I will closely examine the way the Navy manages inventory and will work with the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Commandant to make sure our infrastructure supports the warfighter.

Question. This underinvestment in infrastructure is particularly acute in naval shipyard facilities. According to the Navy's shipyard modernization plan, it will take 17 years and $3.4 billion to clear the maintenance and infrastructure repair backlog.

If confirmed, how do you plan on addressing this shortfall?

Answer. Materiel readiness is a key enabler to maintaining freedom of the seas. I'm also aware of the fiscal challenges facing the Department. If confirmed, I will advocate for and work with the Chief of Naval Operations and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Research, Development, and Acquisition) to ensure that whatever funding may be available for shore infrastructure, including shipyards and depots, is allocated appropriately to meet mission critical needs.

Question. How do you believe the difficult budget environment will affect the Navy's shipyard modernization efforts going forward in light of other competing priorities?

Answer. I believe the current fiscal environment will present significant challenges across the entire Department. When faced with reduced resources, any organization, whether a business or a household, must assess its short- and long-term objectives and make prudent expenditures and investments accordingly. I believe the same holds true for the Department of the Navy. If confirmed, I will look forward to meeting the challenge of balancing the Department's infrastructure investments across a broad array of requirements.

ENHANCED USE LEASES

Question. Congress has provided the authority for each of the Service Secretaries to lease underutilized non-excess property and to use revenues generated by those leases to enhance infrastructure and operating costs on those installations. This so-called "enhanced use lease" (EUL) authority is being used in different ways and for different purposes by each of the military departments.

What is your understanding of the EUL authority?

Answer. My understanding is that the enhanced use lease authority is a valuable tool in the Department's infrastructure management toolbox. My understanding is that the Navy can use this authority to partner with industry and the outside community to maximize the use of Department property Question. What do you see as the future of the Department of the Navy's EUL program?

Answer. I understand that there are several promising EUL opportunities that the Department of the Navy is currently examining.

Question. What Navy and Marine Corps EUL projects do you see as most viable in the near term?

Answer. Because I am not aware of all the current projects or those projects being considered, I could not identify the most viable in the near term. If confirmed, I will examine all of our projects more fully before making such an assessment.

Question. If confirmed, what would be your priorities for the Department of the Navy's EUL program?

Answer. I do not have a sufficient level of understanding to identify priorities at this time. If confirmed, I will examine all of our projects more fully and discuss with Navy stakeholders before making such an assessment.

Question. If confirmed, would you consider the authority to provide support to energy initiatives?

Answer. If confirmed, I will utilize the EUL program to ensure our warfighters and their families have the highest quality environment in which to live and work and that the Department's real estate is put to the highest valued uses.

Question. The Congressional Budget Office has expressed concern that EUL authority could be used to acquire expensive facilities through long-term leases that commit the Department of Defense to make payments (rather than receiving payments) over an extended period of time.

Do you believe that it would be appropriate to use EUL authority to commit future-years Department of Defense funds for long-term projects to acquire facilities that have not received approval through the normal budgeting process?

Answer. I have not yet had an opportunity to study this issue, but if confirmed, I certainly will do so.

Question. If confirmed, how would you address proposals to use EUL authority in this manner?

Answer. Since I have not had an opportunity to study this issue, I do not know how I would address such proposals if confirmed.

BASE OPERATING SUPPORT

Question. What is your understanding of the base operating support requirements of the Department of the Navy and Marine Corps?

Answer. My understanding is that Base Operating Support (BOS) requirements of the Department of the navy are critical to the overall mission readiness of our Navy and Marine Corps. BOS funding finances shore activities that support ship, aviation, combat operations, critical training, facilities infrastructure maintenance, public safety, and family programs for both Active and Reserve components.

Question. In your view, is the Department of the Navy receiving adequate funding for base operating support?

Answer. I have not had an opportunity to review BOS funding in detail, but if confirmed, I will closely examine funding levels to ensure the highest quality living and working conditions for our sailors, marines, and their families.

Question. How might the Department of the Navy distribute base operating funds to best ensure sound investment of constrained resources?

Answer. If confirmed, I am committed to learning the methods and processes in place across the Department to guide investment decisions and distribution of resources.

FAMILY HOUSING AND PRIVATIZATION

Question. In recent years, the Department of Defense and Congress have taken significant steps to improve family housing. The housing privatization program was created as an alternative approach to speed the improvement of military family housing and relieve base commanders of the burden of managing family housing. If confirmed for the position of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment you will have a key role in decisions regarding military family housing.

What are your impressions of the overall quality and sufficiency of Navy and Marine Corps family housing both in the United States and abroad?

Answer. My understanding is that major improvements have been made to the overall of the quality and sufficiency of family housing inventory, both domestically and overseas.

Question. What are your views regarding the privatization of family housing?

Answer. I believe the use of the housing privatization authorities was an important and necessary tool to revitalize a large inventory of homes in a relatively short period of time.

Question. What is your view of the structure and general goals of the Department of the Navy's current housing privatization program?

Answer. I believe the structure and general goals of the Department's housing privatization program are sound.

Question. Do you believe the housing program should be modified in any way? If so, how?

Answer. I have not had an opportunity to review the housing program in detail to determine if it should be modified in any way, but if confirmed, I will closely examine it to ensure the highest quality living and working conditions for our sailors, marines, and their families.

ENVIRONMENTAL RESTORATION

Question. The Department of the Navy's environmental restoration budget remains a significant part of the Navy's overall environmental program budget.

What do you see as the main priorities for clean-up within the Department of the Navy program?

Answer. The Department of the Navy's priorities for clean-up are established by the Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Installations and Environment), and, if confirmed, I will work closely with the Deputy Under Secretary to ensure that those priorities are implemented Question. What will you do to ensure that adequate funding is requested and received so that clean-ups under the Installation Restoration Program and under the Military Munitions Remediation Program continue apace?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that I fully understand the clean-up priorities, as established by the Secretary of the Navy, and will work with the Secretary, as well as Members of Congress, to ensure that adequate funding for clean-up is both requested and received.

PAST WATER CONTAMINATION AT CAMP LEJEUNE

Question. For more than 12 years, the Department of the Navy has been trying to understand and resolve issues associated with past water contamination suspected at Camp Lejeune in North Carolina. However, aspects of this matter remain unresolved, including the nature and extent of various scientific studies into the potential human exposure.

If confirmed, what will you do to help ensure that all reasonable actions are taken to resolve this matter as expeditiously as possible?

Answer. The Department of the Navy is committed to ensuring the health and safety of all its personnel—both past and present. I know that the Department has commissioned numerous scientific studies to inquire into a possible connection between past water contamination at Camp Lejeune and health issues of personnel who served there. I have not, however, been made privy to their results. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department, using the information from these studies, acts promptly and in accordance with all applicable laws to resolve this important matter.

ENCROACHMENT ON MILITARY INSTALLATIONS

Question. Encroachment by commercial and residential development on military installations can negatively impact Navy and Marine Corps operations at military airfields, training ranges, and the development of new facilities.

What do you see as the main constraints on the Department of the Navy's ability to use its facilities, including training ranges?

Answer. I am not aware of any specific constraints on the Department of the Navy's ability to use its facilities. I believe that the Department has completed or is completing environmental impact statements for its training ranges, and that these ranges are operated in accordance with the results.

Question. If confirmed, what policies or steps would you take to balance the trade-off between energy development and the impact on operations and training?

Answer. I believe that military operations and energy development are not mutually exclusive. If confirmed, I would work closely with Federal, State, and local governments as well as the energy developers to meet the needs of the Department while enabling access to new sources of energy.

Question. How can the Department of the Navy address the issues of encroachment around its bases in the United States, particularly with respect to encroachment caused by residential development?

Answer. I believe the Department of the Navy must take a two-pronged approach to addressing issues of encroachment around its bases. First, it is important to communicate concerns with local communities. Second, where appropriate, the Department should seek additional land surrounding its bases.

Question. One significant issue for the Navy has been the potential interference to aircraft radars of wind farms installed around military installations and ranges.

Given your qualifications, including as a former naval aviator, what would you propose as objectives and goals to address this issue?

Answer. As a naval aviator, I know that while wind turbines can physically interfere with aircraft operations and military training routes, that problem is a merely matter of proper siting. The much more difficult issue is the electromagnetic interference caused wind turbines which can impact radars many miles away. I'm aware the Department of Defense has created a body to assess the impact of these projects and if confirmed I will work to ensure we can reap the benefits from alternative energy development without impacting training and operations.

Question. What is your understanding of the Navy's ability to receive information and plans from potential developers in a timely and effective manner?

Answer. I believe the Department of Defense has established procedures to assess the impact of these proposed projects and that while the process is still fairly new and developing, it does afford an opportunity for the Navy to review these plans. If confirmed, I would work to ensure this system continues to improve.

PENDING LAND WITHDRAWAL REQUESTS

Question. As part of the President's budget request for fiscal year 2014, the Department of Defense has requested legislation for a number of land withdrawals, including the reauthorization of the land withdrawals at the Chocolate Mountains and at China Lake, as well a land withdrawal to support an expansion at the Marine Corps base at Twentynine Palms.

What is your understanding of these requests and why are each of these withdrawals important to the Department of Navy missions and capabilities?

Answer. My general understanding is that the Department of Defense seeks to control only the minimum amount of property necessary to meet the military requirement. From my experience, I know the Chocolate Mountain range, the test center at China Lake and the Marine Corps base at Twentynine Palms are key DON installations.

ENERGY POLICY

Question. If confirmed, what would your responsibilities be for setting and implementing energy policy within the Department?

Answer. If confirmed, my responsibilities would be to support the Secretary's Navy Energy Office and work towards meeting the Secretary's shore and operational energy goals.

Question. Do you support the Department of Defense policy on alternative fuels released in July 2012 that the Department of Defense will not make bulk purchases of alternative drop-in replacement fuels unless they are cost competitive with petroleum products?

Answer. Yes, I support the DOD policy to only make bulk purchases of alternative drop-in fuels that are cost competitive with conventional fuel.

Question. In your view, how does the bulk use of alternative drop-in replacement fuels improve the military capabilities of the fleet?

Answer. In addition to reducing reliance on foreign sources of energy, "drop-in" fuels would not require any infrastructure or operational changes to bring on line.

Question. Given recent forecasts about oil production in the United States over the next 30 years, what do you see as the national security implications, if any, of a dependence on fossil fuels?

Answer. Fossil fuels, whether imported or domestically produced, are subject to price volatility and uncertainty of supply. Deriving fuels from other than petroleum sources adds to the supply and helps mitigate fluctuating prices.

Question. In your opinion, are the statutory and regulatory goals for the Department of the Navy regarding the use of renewable energy and alternative fuels realistic and achievable?

Answer. I have not yet had an opportunity to study this issue, but if confirmed, I will review the Department's progress towards meeting the statutory and regulatory goals regarding the use of renewable energy and alternative fuels. If confirmed, it is my intention to meet these goals unless otherwise directed.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of Department of the Navy funding to meet statutory and regulatory energy conservation goals?

Answer. At this point, I do not have in-depth knowledge of the Department's budget, but I am aware of the significant fiscal challenges it faces. If confirmed, I will advocate for and work with the Secretary of the Navy, the CNO, the Commandant, the General Counsel, and the Judge Advocate General, to ensure statutory and regulatory conservation goals are met.

Question. Do you believe that significant additional funding will be needed in future years to meet such goals?

Answer. At this point, I do not have in-depth knowledge of the Department's budget, but I am aware of the significant fiscal challenges it faces. Further, energy security directly enhances national security. If confirmed, I will advocate for and work with the Secretary of the Navy, the CNO and the Commandant to ensure the continued support of the Department's energy goals while meeting the needs of the warfighter.

Question. If confirmed, what energy goals and policies will you promote for the Department of the Navy for investments and initiatives that provide direct and tangible benefit to the warfighter or less cost for the Department?

Answer. If confirmed, I will establish priorities consistent with those of the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the Secretary of the Navy. In broad terms, I will assist the Secretary of the Navy in meeting the energy goals laid out for the Department in 2009. I will promote energy policies that provide energy security for fleet and shore units, enable additional combat capability for operational forces, and leverage opportunities to reduce the energy cost of operating shore infrastructure.

IMPLICATIONS OF CLIMATE CHANGE

Question. What do you see as the national security implications of climate change, if any, for the United States?

Answer. Climate change will affect food production and living conditions to varying degrees worldwide. Rising sea levels will impact coastal communities as well as critical Navy infrastructure located in these communities.

Question. What do you believe will be the impact of climate change, if any, on the Navy and Marine Corps mission?

Answer. I believe the Navy and Marine Corps mission will remain the same however, we will need to enhance Navy capabilities to operate in Arctic waters, including weather and sea-condition forecasting. There is also likely to be a growing number of requests for help responding to natural disasters, food shortages, and government instability caused by climate change.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY LABORATORY AND TEST CENTER RECAPITALIZATION

Question. There has been concern over the adequacy of recapitalization rates of the Department's laboratory facilities and test centers. Historically, Navy technical centers, laboratories and test centers do not appear to have fared well in the internal Navy competition for limited military construction and facility sustainment funds.

What metrics would you use to assess the amount of investment in the recapitalization of Navy technical centers, laboratories and test centers to determine its adequacy?

Answer. I have not had an opportunity to assess the amount of investment required, but if confirmed, I will closely examine the issue and work with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Research, Development, and Acquisition) (ASN(RD&A)) to determine the appropriate metrics to use.

Question. If confirmed, how would you work with ASN(RD&A) and other stakeholders to properly recapitalize the Navy's technical centers, laboratories and test centers?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work directly with the ASN(RD&A) to gain a better understanding of the requirement and with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller) to ascertain what are the available financing mechanisms and constraints.

SECTION 2808 AUTHORITY

Question. Section 2808 of title 10, U.S.C., allows the Secretary of Defense, in the event of a declaration of war or national emergency, to undertake military construction projects supporting the use of Armed Forces with otherwise unobligated military construction funds.

What is your assessment of this authority?

Answer. I believe this authority is vital to provide construction projects necessary under a national emergency or declaration of war.

Question. From a policy standpoint, what restrictions do you believe are appropriate for the use of this authority?

Answer. I am not fully versed in the policy regarding this statute. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department is executing any projects under this statute in accordance with applicable guidance.

Question. Do you believe it is appropriate to use this authority outside theaters of armed conflict? If so, in what instances?

Answer. I believe the statute is necessary to allow the department flexibility in executing urgent construction projects in the event of a declaration of war or national emergency. I have not had an opportunity to study it in detail and cannot today provide an example of a hypothetical situation.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis of any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOE MANCHIN III

SUGAR GROVE

1. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. McGinn, I wanted to talk about Sugar Grove—a Navy base in West Virginia. This is a world-class facility that has contributed immensely to our national security, especially in the last decade during the war on terror. But, the mission is changing there. Sugar Grove is not going away, it's just going to have a different mission. We have been working with the Navy, and the community, and other governmental agencies, to find a new tenant and a new mission. Could you give me an update on how that process is going? Is there anything we can do to help move the process along?

Mr. MCGINN. I understand that the Navy is the installation host to another Government agency which has plans to leave the installation in a few years and that the Navy is currently looking for an alternative use for the installation after the NSA departs in a few years. I don't know what point in the process the Navy has reached, but if confirmed, I will ensure the Navy proceeds without undue delay and that I will keep you updated of any progress.

NAVY BIOFUELS

2. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. McGinn, the Navy has been pushing for greater usage of biofuels to cut its dependence on foreign oil. But, a RAND report published in 2011 raised serious questions regarding the ability to produce biofuels at a large enough scale to make a positive impact to military operations. However, that report did identify the production of fuel from a combination of biomass and coal as a near-term pathway to low-greenhouse gas, affordable fuels that can be produced at a large scale. Have you read that RAND report?

Mr. MCGINN. Yes, I have read the report and am familiar with the assertions stated therein.

3. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. McGinn, please comment on whether you will pursue near-term pathways such as coal and biomass-to-liquids technologies with real, near-term benefits.

Mr. MCGINN. It is my understanding that the Military Departments are testing and certifying pathways that will serve as a drop-in replacement for liquid fuels on our operational platforms. I am not aware of each pathway that has been tested and certified for use but would support all pathways that meet technical and legal standards.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR TIM KAINE

NAVY LABORATORY AND TEST CENTER RECAPITALIZATION

4. Senator KAINE. Mr. McGinn, historically, Navy technical centers, laboratories, and test centers do not appear to have fared well in the internal Navy competition for limited military construction and facility sustainment funds. These centers and laboratories are crucial to developing the next generation of capabilities for the warfighter and the quality of research facilities influences the ability of the Navy to attract the best scientists and engineers. DOD is increasingly in competition with the private sector for the best and brightest. If confirmed, what will you do to adequately resource the Navy's laboratories and technical and test centers?

Mr. MCGINN. I agree that the Navy's laboratories and technical test centers are a crucial component of developing our future capability and readiness. The current fiscal environment will present significant investment challenges across the entire Department. If confirmed, I look forward to meeting the challenge of balancing the Department's infrastructure investments across a broad array of requirements, including laboratories and test centers.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

PRIORITIES

5. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, in October 2009, before the Environmental and Public Works Subcommittee, you testified: "[Climate change] will magnify existing tensions in critical regions, overwhelm fragile political, economic and social structures, causing them to fracture and fail. The predictable result: much greater frequency and intensity of regional conflict and direct threats to our United States' interests and national security. . . . The science community has clear consensus in concluding that human activities are the most significant cause of climate change." Do you still believe this?

Mr. MCGINN. Yes, I do.

6. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, you also testified: "But unlike what many believe—it is not just foreign oil that jeopardizes our energy security. It is all oil. We simply do not have enough sustainable oil resources in this country to free us from the stranglehold of those who do . . . we will never have enough domestic supply to meet our need for this fuel so we must deliberately and effectively wean ourselves from it." Do you still believe this?

Mr. MCGINN. Yes, I continue to be concerned about our energy security and the global oil market, even with the welcome and positive projections of greatly increased domestic production to occur over the next 10 to 15 years. As a part of the global oil market, I believe it is in our national interest to minimize our vulnerability to supply interruptions and price spikes due to geo-political events, terrorism and natural disasters, in part by diversifying our sources of transportation energy.

7. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, do you plan to formulate polices for the Navy to address these beliefs?

Mr. MCGINN. If confirmed, my formulation of energy policies for the Department of Navy will be guided by the policies of the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the Secretary of the Navy. I will apply my very best judgment to determine how best to balance the investment of available resources to achieve the best outcomes for both near-term mission readiness and future readiness and capabilities.

8. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, what changes would you propose to Department of the Navy programs?

Mr. MCGINN. If confirmed, I will take a deliberate and collaborative cost, benefit and risk analysis approach to determine whether changes to Navy programs are necessary.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR NATIONAL ENERGY POLICY

9. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, which Federal agency, the Department of Energy (DOE) or DOD, is responsible for developing and promoting a national energy policy?

Mr. MCGINN. It is my understanding that the President establishes national energy policies which are then executed by multiple parts of the administration. I believe that a sound energy policy incorporates energy security and that both DOD and DOE have key roles to play as defined in several inter-agency agreements.

10. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, in your opinion, given the devastating impact of sequestration occurring now to the readiness and capabilities of the Armed Forces, why should DOD be the primary source of funds and leadership for the construction of a commercial biofuels refinery?

Mr. MCGINN. A declining defense budget coupled with the elevated petroleum prices is the primary reason that DOD, the single largest consumer of fossil fuel in the Federal Government, is interested in accelerating the establishment of a domestic biofuels industry. It is my understanding that the agreement signed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the Department of Energy, and the Department of the Navy in 2011 to stand up a commercial scale, domestic biofuels industry that will produce drop-in alternative fuels at a price competitive with petroleum calls for equal contributions from each department. This investment figure will then be matched by private industry investment.

VIEWS ON NATIONAL SECURITY

11. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, given the range of national security threats facing this Nation, how would you rank the threat of climate change?

Mr. MCGINN. I consider climate change to be a threat to our national security. It is one of many threats that our Navy and Marine Corps will confront and, in many ways, has the potential to act as a threat multiplier for instability, serving in some cases to augment and accelerate the underlying causes of conflict.

12. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, how would you rank the threat of our Nation's dependence on fossil fuels?

Mr. MCGINN. I consider the Department of the Navy's reliance on petroleum products to fuel our ships and aircraft as a supply vulnerability. Despite the very good news about increasing U.S production of natural gas and petroleum, I am concerned by the increase in global demand, rising prices and potential supply disruptions. I support the Secretary of the Navy's efforts to lessen this vulnerability by increasing the energy efficiency of training and operations and the supply of domestically produced alternative fuels.

13. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, are you familiar with the President's Defense Strategic Guidance released in January 2012? (Sustaining U.S. Global Leadership: Priorities for 21st Century Defense)

Mr. MCGINN. Yes, I am familiar with this guidance.

14. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, how many additional hours will have to be dedicated to bring all these units and its aircrews back up to mission ready status?

Mr. MCGINN. While I understand that sequestration and Continuing Resolutions have had a significant negative impact on the Department's mission readiness, I have not had the opportunity to develop a thorough understanding of those effects and, if confirmed, will study this critical readiness issue and work to help alleviate it.

15. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, how much will that cost?
Mr. MCGINN. I am not familiar with the official costs and, if confirmed, will work diligently with the operators in the Navy and Marine Corps to determine priority investments for the Department.

16. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, do you know what is says about the national security implications of climate change, energy independence, and a domestic reliance on fossil fuels?
Mr. MCGINN. While the Defense Strategic Guidance does not directly address the security implications of climate change, energy independence and domestic reliance on fossil fuels, it does address the need to maintain an adequate industrial base and our investment in science and technology as these do contribute to our overall security posture.

17. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, if confirmed, would you be committed to promoting the core defense priorities for the Department of the Navy in support of the Defense Strategic Guidance?
Mr. MCGINN. If confirmed, I will support the priorities of the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the Secretary of the Navy as expressed in multiple defense policy and guidance documents.

SUPPOSED MILITARY CAPABILITIES OF THE GREEN FLEET

18. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, the committee specifically asked you in advance for your view, given your impressive Navy career and military expertise, how the bulk use of alternative drop-in replacement fuels improves the military capabilities of the fleet. You responded: "In addition to reducing reliance on foreign sources of energy, 'drop-in' fuels would not require any infrastructure or operational changes to bring on line."
How exactly does your answer translate into an enhanced or improved military capability for Navy ships, planes and submarines?
Mr. MCGINN. Liquid alternative fuels are not being considered as a drop-in replacement for our nuclear-powered submarine fleet. However, for our ships, vehicles and aircraft, a drop-in alternative fuel will provide strategic and operational benefits by providing commanders with additional refueling resources to help dampen the volatility of fossil fuel prices that now strain our operational readiness budgets.

19. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, in your view, should Navy investments in alternative fuels be justified with the same rationale that led the Navy to invest billions in the development of nuclear powered ships?
Mr. MCGINN. While I fully support the Department's efforts to invest in alternative liquid fuel supplies, especially from multiple feedstocks, I do not believe the costs of that investment will be on the same scale, nor for the same strategic rationale, as past investments in nuclear energy.

THE FALLACY OF FUEL PRICE VOLATILITY

20. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, you responded to an advance policy question about the national security implications of a dependence on fossil fuels by noting that, "Fossil fuels, whether imported or domestically produced, are subject to price volatility and uncertainty of supply. Deriving fuels from other than petroleum sources adds to the supply and helps mitigate fluctuating prices." Given the fact that the use of ethanol over the last 15 years has not affected the volatility of petroleum prices, what analysis do you have that supports your assertion?
Mr. MCGINN. The use of ethanol for transportation fuel in the United States has played an important role in accounting for about 10 percent of our domestic gasoline supply mix. Incorporating ethanol in our gasoline supply acts as a useful blending component and expands supply diversity. Diversity of supply helps to cushion our exposure to the price fluctuations and volatility driven by the dynamics of a global market.

21. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, to what degree of confidence do you have that DOD investments in the development of alternative fuels will directly result in a reduction in the volatility of petroleum prices?

Mr. MCGINN. I am confident that our investments in alternative fuels will increase the overall supply and diversity of liquid fuel products suitable for use in our ships, vehicles and aircraft, and thereby helping to cushion our exposure to the price fluctuations and volatility driven by the dynamics of a global market.

22. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, do you assume that a demand for alternative fuels will not result in the same type of price volatility?

Mr. MCGINN. I believe that the price of every commodity can rise and fall in response to supply and demand. As a major consumer of liquid fuel vital to our national security, DOD would greatly benefit from a competitive, domestic renewable fuel industry capable of broadening the fuel supply base by using multiple feedstocks.

PENDING LAND WITHDRAWAL REQUESTS

23. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, one of the top priorities for the Department of the Navy this year is to renew or initiate a series of land withdrawals for ranges supporting the Navy and Marine Corps, including the expansion of the combat center range Marine Corps Base, Twentynine Palms, CA. Can you provide for the record your personal assessment of the need for these withdrawals?

Mr. MCGINN. As a Naval Aviator with 35 years of active service and command experience at the squadron, carrier, and fleet level, I understand the critical need to conduct realistic, coordinated live fire training and to train like we fight. I cannot overstate the importance of renewing the land withdrawals at the Chocolate Mountain range and the test center at China Lake, as well as expanding the combat center range at Marine Corps Base, Twentynine Palms. These three training and testing installations are vital to maintaining our current readiness and to ensuring we are ready to fight and win our Nation's wars.

GUAM

24. Senator INHOFE. Mr. McGinn, on the issue of billions of dollars planned for investment on Guam, do you support this committee's position that U.S. or Japanese funds should not be spent until we have a clear and detailed assessment of the plans and costs for the laydown of marines in Guam and Hawaii?

Mr. MCGINN. The realignment of marines to Guam is the right strategic move to support the United States posture in the Pacific. A construction effort of this size will take over 10 years to complete. While it is prudent to understand the entire plan and costs, I believe it makes sense to start now on projects for which all required environmental planning is complete, in order to prepare for a larger construction surge when the final planning and environmental studies are complete. Starting some of these projects will reinforce our commitment to allies in the region and will help facilitate our negotiations with the Government of Japan on continued funding for the realignment.

INSTALLATION MAINTENANCE

25. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. McGinn, there has been a significant impact on facility sustainment because of sequestration and an additional cut of $53 billion in fiscal year 2014 will further degrade important facilities. Deferred facility repairs are not savings, but an assumption of greater risk that contributes to lower military readiness. How will you recover deferred repairs at critical facilities accumulated in 2013?

Mr. MCGINN. I understand that facility sustainment accounts were hit hard due to sequestration in fiscal year 2013. I agree that deferred facility maintenance comes with risk of higher repair bills in the future. To recover from deferred repairs, the Navy will have to be prudent when deciding how to expend diminishing resources to strike the right balance between operational requirements and risk to our shore infrastructure.

26. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. McGinn, can you describe specific impacts to installations, environment, and energy programs if sequestration continues into 2014?

Mr. MCGINN. If sequestration continues into 2014, I expect there will be similar reductions in funding for facility sustainment and base operations and support accounts. These continued reductions would have a compounding impact on the state of our facilities. At this time, I cannot describe any specific cuts or impacts. If confirmed, one of my highest priorities will be to understand the impacts of sequestration on the entire energy, installations, and environment portfolio and to ensure we are evaluating every investment to balance current and future readiness with risk to our shore infrastructure.

NAVY FACILITY BACKLOG

27. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. McGinn, in April, the Navy submitted an investment plan for the modernization of Naval Shipyards required by the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012. The report indicated that the overall condition of the infrastructure is below the Navy average, and there is a $3.5 billion maintenance backlog associated with infrastructure, which includes $1.2 billion in deficiencies at mission essential facilities. The report also stated that the Navy will need about 17 years, at current funding rates, just to clear the current maintenance backlog. The Navy is examining ways to accelerate facility investment to fix the backlog under a 10-year plan. Do you know what additional annual funding you will need to achieve this goal?

Mr. MCGINN. Materiel readiness is a key enabler to maintaining freedom of the seas. I am aware of the investment plan and the Navy's commitment to address the backlog. I don't know what specific level or type of additional funding would be required to accelerate the plan. If confirmed, I will advocate for and work with the Chief of Naval Operations and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Research, Development, and Acquisition) to ensure that whatever funding may be available for shore infrastructure, including shipyards and depots, is allocated appropriately to meet mission critical needs.

28. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. McGinn, how will sequestration in 2013 and 2014 affect this plan?

Mr. MCGINN. I can't address any specific impacts to the plan from sequestration in 2013. If sequestration continues into 2014, it will challenge investments across the entire Energy, Installations and Environment portfolio. When faced with reduced resources, any organization, whether a business or a household, must assess its short- and long-term objectives and make prudent expenditures and investments accordingly. I believe the same holds true for the Department of the Navy. If confirmed, one of my highest priorities will be to understand the impacts of sequestration on the entire Energy, Installations, and Environment portfolio and to ensure we are evaluating every investment to balance current and future readiness with risk to our infrastructure investments across a broad array of requirements.

FAMILY HOUSING

29. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. McGinn, I am troubled about recent reports regarding concerns expressed by residents at Admiralty Village—a public-private family housing facility that supports personnel working at Portsmouth Naval Shipyard. Some residents have expressed concerns regarding black mold that may be causing health problems in residents, water dripping from ceiling light fixtures, and old appliances that are leaking gas. I want to make sure Captain William Greene, Commander at Portsmouth Naval Shipyard, is receiving all of the support and resources he needs from the Navy in order to address this problem. Are you aware of these reports and if confirmed, will you ensure that Captain Greene, and commanders like him around the Navy, receive the support and resources they need to ensure our military families have military housing that is worthy of their service?

Mr. MCGINN. I am aware of the reports in the press regarding Admiralty Village and I share your concern for the safety and well-being of our servicemembers. If confirmed, I will ensure our commanders have the support and resources they need to provide the highest quality living and working conditions for our sailors, marines, and their families.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. Good morning, everybody.

The committee meets this morning to consider military nominations for two critically important command assignments. We welcome Admiral Cecil Haney who is nominated to be Commander, U.S. Strategic Command (STRATCOM) and Lieutenant General Curtis Scaparrotti who is nominated to be Commander, United Nations (U.N.) Command, Combined Forces Command, and U.S. Forces Korea (USFK). Thank you both for your decades of service to our Nation and for your willingness to continue to serve in these positions of great responsibility.

We would also like to welcome and to thank your family members, some of whom are here this morning. Our military families are essential to the overall success and the well-being of our Armed Forces, and we appreciate greatly their many sacrifices, particularly during the course of long military careers. In this regard, as is the tradition of this committee, we invite each of you, during your opening remarks, to introduce the family members or others who are here with you this morning.

It is most appropriate that these nominees appear together because the responsibilities of the positions to which they have been nominated intersect, particularly as they relate to the security situation on the Korean Peninsula and the potential threats from North Korea.

Unfortunately, as has been evident from the words and actions from North Korea in the last several months, the leadership change in North Korea, occasioned by the death of longtime dictator Kim Jong-il, has not yet resulted in any meaningful, positive change in North Korea's policies. North Korea continues its reckless pursuit of ballistic missiles, nuclear weapons, and continues to threaten its neighbors and the overall peace and stability in the region. The regime remains determined to defy the international community to the detriment of its own prosperity and growth and with little concern for the well-being of its own people.

STRATCOM is responsible for our deployed nuclear deterrence, integrating global missile defense, managing military space systems, and countering weapons of mass destruction. STRATCOM also oversees Cyber Command, a sub-unified command tasked with managing military operations in cyberspace, and is charged with coordinating the Department of Defense's (DOD) electromagnetic spectrum. If confirmed, Admiral Haney will be a key player in the overall strategic posture and policy of the United States.

Admiral, we will be interested in your views on the U.S. nuclear employment strategy, your priorities for missile defense, and the status of Cyber Command. With regard to North Korea in particular, we would be interested in your thoughts on the various steps announced earlier this year by Secretary Hagel to improve Homeland missile defense capability, including the planned deployment of 14 additional ground-based interceptors (GBI) in Alaska by 2017.

Lieutenant General Scaparrotti is currently the Director of the Joint Staff where he assists the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff with many of the most challenging issues facing our military and our country today. If confirmed, he will bring his breadth of experience to bear on maintaining a military force on the Korean Peninsula that is ready, willing, and able to respond to any aggression from North Korea. General, we would be interested in your assessment of the security situation on the peninsula, the posture of U.S. Forces there, and the plan for the transfer of wartime operational control from the United States to the South Koreans in December 2015.

Admiral and General, we again welcome you today. We look forward to your testimony.

I now call on Senator Inhofe.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I join you in welcoming General Scaparrotti and Admiral Haney. I thank both of you for the time that you have spent coming over in personal visits.

General Scaparrotti, you have been nominated to replace General Thurman as Commander of the U.S. Forces in Korea, and General Thurman and the men and women under his command have done a tremendous job in standing with our South Korean partners to ensure stability in the Korean Peninsula.

However, this stability is at risk. Tensions over the last year have risen dramatically, and as a result, Kim Jong-un's belligerent behavior, including the testing of nuclear weapons and launching of ballistic missiles, his provocative actions threaten to overturn the peace, stability, and prosperity of the entire region.

Our military capabilities in the region must be designed to deter North Korean aggression, but should deterrence fail, it has to be ready to punish aggression, to protect vital U.S. interests, partners, and allies. However, I am greatly concerned that further defense cuts under the sequestration will put these capabilities at risk, undermine our influence in the region, and will encourage Kim Jong-un's reckless behavior.

Admiral Haney, you have been nominated to serve as the next Commander of STRATCOM. If confirmed, your principal responsibility will be to ensure the effectiveness of our Nation's nuclear deterrent force. This requires a credible nuclear strategy backed by capable nuclear forces. There is cause for concern in both respects. Not only are our nuclear modernization programs facing funding cuts and increasing schedule delays, but the President's insistence on reducing the role and number of nuclear weapons could also undermine deterrence and make our allies nervous.

The current Commander of STRATCOM told Congress earlier this year that as the sequester impacts continue to grow, he said, "Reduced readiness and curtailed modernization damage the perceived credibility of our capabilities, increasing the risks to achieve our primary deterrence and assurance objectives." These cuts are likely to have real negative consequences on our ability to deal with the crisis around the world which, in turn, may increase rather than reduce the role of nuclear weapons in our national security strategy.

We also face a growing and increasingly complex threat with cyberspace, and despite the reality, this administration has failed to implement an effective cyber deterrence strategy that dissuades those seeking to hold our economic and national security interests at risk in cyberspace. While the White House has been quick to blame Congress on the need for cyber legislation, it has been slow in developing and implementing the far more important strategy for exposing, countering, and deterring our adversaries.

Finally, the Department is currently debating the elevation of the Cyber Command from its current position under STRATCOM to become its own unified command. We will want to talk about that, and I look forward to your comments.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

Admiral Haney?

STATEMENT OF ADM CECIL E.D. HANEY, USN, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF ADMIRAL AND TO BE COMMANDER, U.S. STRATEGIC COMMAND

Admiral HANEY. Mr. Chairman, Senator Inhofe, and distinguished members of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to come before you today. It is my sincere honor to appear as the nominee to lead STRATCOM.

I am honored to be here also with some of my family members. First, my wife Bonnie, who sits behind me here, has been with me throughout my military career, and has raised three wonderful children who could not be here today. She is also representative of all the spouses that support our military servicemembers.

Second, my sister, Dr. Yvonne Coates is here, who has worked tirelessly in my hometown, Washington, DC, here as a public school educator for many years.

Our All-Volunteer Force is sustained by our families that support us and allow us to serve.

I am also honored to be here with Lieutenant General Scaparrotti.

I would like to thank the President and the Secretary of Defense for nominating me. I also thank the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for expressing his confidence in my ability to serve as a combatant commander. If so confirmed, I look forward to working with this committee to address the strategic challenges that face our Nation. They are complex and compelling, and STRATCOM plays a key role in each. I know that this committee knows and respects the strategic challenges we face today and the ones over the horizon that must be addressed. Complex threats provide opportunities for terrorism and raise significant security concerns. We must address nuclear issues today to include both state and nonstate actors, proliferation, and weapons of mass destruction.

Space, though a vast operational area, is a complex environment that is competitive, congested, and contested. Addressing the cyber threat is critical to our national security. Intensive and extensive cooperation across the whole of government and the governments of our allies, partners, and friends is required to prepare for and respond to these developments. Our ability as a Nation to shape events to our interests will continue to depend on the skill and dedication of the great men and women who serve our Nation.

Leading STRATCOM is a significant responsibility and a unique opportunity. If confirmed, I pledge to you that I will devote all of my energy, commitment, and focus to address these challenges.

I am very fortunate to have had assignments to include operational experiences and command opportunities that align with STRATCOM's mission set. I believe they have prepared me for this challenge. If confirmed, I will also be fortunate and deeply humbled to follow the paths blazed by some of our truly great national leaders that have mentored me such as Admiral Hank Chiles and Rich Mies and General Kevin Chilton, prior commanders of STRATCOM who have helped in shaping my intellect, experiences, and understanding. I also want to thank the current Commander, General Bob Kehler, whose leadership has been deeply important in these past critical years to shaping our national posture, and I am grateful to have served with him as his deputy.

Of course, as always, if confirmed, I look forward to working with and caring for the world's best soldiers, sailors, airmen, marines, and civilians and their families.

Mr. Chairman, Senator Inhofe, distinguished committee members, it is a privilege to be before you here today, and I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Admiral, thank you very much.

General?

STATEMENT OF LTG CURTIS M. SCAPARROTTI, USA, TO BE GENERAL AND COMMANDER, UNITED NATIONS COMMAND/ COMBINED FORCES COMMAND/U.S. FORCES KOREA

General SCAPARROTTI. Chairman Levin, Senator Inhofe, and other distinguished members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, I thank you for the opportunity to appear here today, and I also want to thank you for the support that you have provided to our servicemembers, our Department of Defense civilians, and their families who selflessly serve in the defense of our great Nation and defense of our way of life.

I would also like to thank the Secretary of Defense and the President for their trust and confidence and for nominating me to be the next Commander for United Nations Command, Combined Forces Command, and U.S. Forces Korea.

If confirmed, I look forward to working closely with this committee, with our civilian and military leadership, and with Republic of Korea military and civilian leadership to advance our national interests and to address the opportunities and challenges in the Korean theater.

If confirmed, I commit to the servicemembers serving in Korea that I will do all that I can to ensure their readiness for the mission and to provide the support that they and their families deserve. I look forward to working with this committee to realize this commitment.

Finally, I would like to introduce and thank my wife Cindy, who is here with me today. She has been by my side for nearly 34 years and has been an essential part of my service. Cindy has supported me during multiple deployments, cared actively for our servicemembers and their families, and raised our children.

Also with me today, Stephanie, our youngest child, is here with her husband, Captain Luke High, presently a company commander in the 82nd Airborne Division. They have given us two grandchildren, Ava and Jacob. My son Michael, who could not be here today, lives and works in Ann Arbor, MI.

I am blessed with this family who has given so much, like other military families, so that I may serve.

I thank the committee again for the opportunity to appear today, and I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, General.

We now ask our witnesses standard questions, and you can respond together to these questions.

Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

Admiral HANEY. I have.

General SCAPARROTTI. I have.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views even if those views differ from the administration in power?

Admiral HANEY. I do.

General SCAPARROTTI. I do.

Chairman LEVIN. Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

Admiral HANEY. No, sir.

General SCAPARROTTI. No.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you ensure your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

Admiral HANEY. I will.

General SCAPARROTTI. I will.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

Admiral HANEY. I will.

General SCAPARROTTI. I will.

Chairman LEVIN. Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?

Admiral HANEY. They will.

General SCAPARROTTI. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?

Admiral HANEY. I do.

General SCAPARROTTI. I do.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Admiral HANEY. I do.

General SCAPARROTTI. I do.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Let us have a 7-minute round this morning to start with for our first round of questions.

Admiral, let me ask you about the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START) which is now being implemented. It was ratified in the Senate in December 2010. Do you support the New START treaty?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, yes, I do.

Chairman LEVIN. On the question of missile defense, in your answers to the prehearing policy questions, Admiral, about the idea of possibly deploying a future east coast missile defense site, you made several important points as follows.

First, you said you support proceeding with the environmental impact statement process that we required in last year's law in order to inform future decisions about such a site.

Second, you said you agree with General Dempsey and Admiral Winnefeld that additional analysis is needed, including analysis of the missile threat from Iran, before making a decision on whether to deploy such a site in the future.

Third, you said you agree with the assessment of Vice Admiral Syring and Lieutenant General Formica on the importance of enhancing our future missile defense sensor and discrimination capability, which they see as a more cost effective and less expensive near-term alternative to deploying an east coast site.

Can you explain this issue of sensor and discrimination capabilities and how they would benefit our Homeland defense?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, thank you for that question.

As we work missile defense and look to the future, it is very important that we are able to discriminate what is coming at us, whether it is a decoy, whether it is a warhead, and be able to address that threat at the right opportunity with our missile defense capability. As we look at prioritizing our efforts, it is so important that we invest properly in the sensing part of this because that way we can balance the equation of our concept of operations and how we address the threat missile per missile.

Chairman LEVIN. Admiral, in the missile defense area, Secretary Hagel and other senior leaders have said that before we deploy any more GBIs, we will first have to conduct successful intercept flight testing to demonstrate that they will work as intended.

Do you agree that we need to make sure that the ground-based midcourse defense system, including both the CE1 and the CE2 kill vehicles, and demonstrate the success of the system in intercept flight test before we deploy any more GBIs?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think it is important that we continue to deploy our CE1s, which have been proven through tests. I also think it is important that we fly before we buy as we look at the CE2 variant so that we can assure we have the reliability that is required in order to address the threats now and into the future.

Chairman LEVIN. General, relative to Korea, I believe it is important that we see to it that the primary responsibility for defending South Korea during a time of war lies with South Korea and that the responsibility for wartime operational control be turned over to the South Koreans as soon as practicable. It is a sovereign nation and sovereign nations should be responsible for their own national defense in time of war, particularly after the length of time that they have been gaining in capability.

Right now, the plan for the transfer of wartime operational control to the Republic of Korea is set for no later than 2015. Do you agree with that timetable?

General SCAPARROTTI. Senator, thank you.

Yes, I do agree with the timetable. It is a bilateral agreement, Strategic Alliance 2015, to turn over operational control by December 2015. I think it is a good plan and it includes milestones that ensure the capability and our integration of forces together to provide the readiness that is needed on the peninsula at the time of that transition. I think we should move forward with it.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you do everything you can, if confirmed, to ensure that the transfer is not delayed any further? It has been delayed two or three times before.

General SCAPARROTTI. Yes, sir. If confirmed, I will do everything possible to ensure that we stay on track with Strategic Alliance 2015.

Chairman LEVIN. Now relative, General, to Camp Humphreys, the Army has proposed a public/private venture to build family housing called the Humphreys Housing Opportunity Project (HHOP). Essentially private developers would build the housing complex and DOD would pay rent in the form of an overseas housing allowance (OHA) for servicemembers that live in the units.

The problem is that the Army has proposed a rental rate of $3,900 per unit per month, which represents a huge increase in the housing allowance rate for servicemembers assigned to the Camp Humphreys area, a rate which currently averages around $1,500 per month. If HHOP were built as planned, a soldier assigned to Camp Humphreys and living off base would receive on average about $1,500 per month while a soldier living in HHOP housing would receive on the average $3,900.

The committee's analysis suggests that the rent paid to the private developer for HHOP units would cost $630 million more than the standard overseas housing rate over 20 years. Moreover, the approval of that higher rate would set a very troubling precedent by using personnel pay accounts to finance a military construction project where the project costs are considered too high to be funded through military construction accounts.

Now, in the current budget environment, it is hard for me and a number of other members of this committee to see a persuasive rationale for a plan that would commit the United States to pay out of DOD personnel accounts an OHA rate two and a half times greater than what has been determined to be reasonable in the Camp Humphreys area and that would then cause this inflated cost to be included in the personnel accounts over the next 20-plus years.

I do not know whether you have had a chance to review this project or not, General, but first, if you have a comment, would you share it with us? In any event, will you get back to us with a more detailed assessment?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, I have reviewed the Senate Armed Services Committee's review of this issue, and I have taken a look at U.S. Forces Korea's review of the issue. If confirmed, I will take a close look at this issue and consider other options to ensure that we can care for our command-sponsored families, as well as maintain the readiness that we need in the Peninsula. I will come back to the committee, if confirmed.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much.

Senator Inhofe?

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Admiral Haney—well, both of you. One of the problems we have in confirmation hearings is it is hard to get answers when they have not assumed that position yet, but you both have a background in the positions that you are going to be moving to. I think you are both excellent choices for those positions.

Admiral Haney, you had stated in response to the chairman here, his question about whether you supported the New START treaty, and you said that you did. I have to say that I did not.

I look at the New START treaty—and there were a lot of commitments that were made at that time in order to get the votes necessary to pass it. It was a close call in the U.S. Senate. Recently, General Kehler said, "I remain concerned that maintaining a safe, secure, and effective deterrent requires a substantial modernization effort that comes in the midst of a very difficult financial period." Modernization is what we were talking about. That was a commitment that was made that has not yet reached its fruition in terms of modernizing. I am concerned about this.

The other concern I had about the START 10 treaty was in the area of the tactical nuclear weapons. Now, would you have supported it more had that been included in terms of the ratio or the numbers of tactical nuclear weapons that Russia has as opposed to what we have? The ratio is about 10 to 1. What is your feeling about the tactical nuclear weapons?

Admiral HANEY. Senator Inhofe, as you have addressed, modernization is important to us, and I would hope that we can continue to do the modernization of weapon warheads, platforms, as well as the industrial base that supports it.

With regards to the tactical nuclear weapons, as we went into New START and with any treaty, it is important that we are able to not just reduce but be able to also verify that the obligations per that agreement are, in fact, able to be carried out. We were able to do that from the basis of warheads, strategic warheads, as well as launchers in the New START treaty.

Personally, I would love to see the world with less tactical nukes, nuclear weapons. The same type of rigor has to be in place in order to have an agreement by which we can reduce tactical nuclear weapons such that they are verifiable, negotiated where they make sense. I would not sit here and even attempt to debate the importance of the reduction of tactical nuclear weapons——

Senator INHOFE. Yes, well, the question then was would you have supported it more vigorously if they had included the tactical nuclear weapons in the New START treaty?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, only if we had verifiable means by which we could verify both the other side, Russia, was carrying out an appropriate obligation.

Senator INHOFE. Okay. The warheads are going to be reduced, I think 1,550. As we move down and we are reducing, it would seem to me that the modernization program is more important, as we are going through a reduction. Would you agree with that?

Admiral HANEY. Yes, Senator, I would agree.

Senator INHOFE. Now, there has been some discussion about doing a unilateral reduction. I cannot remember the exact words, but it was whether they do or not. What is your feeling about a unilateral reduction that would be done outside of the treaty that would be addressed by this committee?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think it is very important that any further reductions are negotiated. Period.

Senator INHOFE. That is good, and I agree with that.

The chairman covered the CE1 and the CE2. I would only say that for us to be in a position where our GBIs are going to be where we want them to be, it is going to require more testing. Would you not agree with this?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I absolutely support more testing.

Senator INHOFE. All right.

General Scaparrotti, we just returned not long ago from Korea. That is a tough one. You are dealing with a guy that is not a rational person. He does all these things that I mentioned in my opening statement. To start out with, would you think dealing with such a person as that, that our current strategy of diplomatic isolation and economic sanctions would stop someone like Kim Jong-un from acquiring a nuclear weapons capability?

General SCAPARROTTI. Senator, I think that our present strategy is correct. I think that we have to be persistent and consistent with that strategy. I also believe that in terms of, if confirmed for the position that I will take there, I will have to do everything that I can in military-to-military relations in order to bring other countries in the region to bear as well. I think the more influence we have both in the region and internationally—and I will have an opportunity to help with that, if confirmed, as the Commander of the United Nations Command—will be helpful in our strategy as well. I share with you the concern about his uncertainty.

Senator INHOFE. That is a kinder way of putting it than I would.

I think when we are looking at sequestration, we are looking at budget cuts, and this does not happen in isolation. There will likely be a reduced carrier presence and U.S. warship presence in the Pacific. Do you think that makes someone like Kim Jong-un more likely to miscalculate or to be more militarily aggressive? What kind of reaction do you think he would have to our reduction of our fleet?

General SCAPARROTTI. Senator, I think that the potential impacts of sequestration, in terms of the reduction of our naval forces, which you mentioned, would likely undercut our deterrence in his eyes and may lead at least to a greater possibility of miscalculation.

Senator INHOFE. Yes. That is a scary thought.

My time has expired, and I appreciate your response.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Inhofe.

Senator Reed?

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Admiral Haney and your family, and thank you for your service.

General Scaparrotti, welcome and to your family. I have had the privilege of working with General Scaparrotti for about 10 years now very closely from his days as commandant of cadets at West Point through the Commander of the 82nd Airborne Division. Thank you for your service, sir, and your family's.

Admiral Haney, one of the issues that we face is modernization of our nuclear deterrence. My understanding is the bulk of our deterrent missiles are at sea now. Is that a fair estimate?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, that is a fair estimate in terms of warheads.

Senator REED. The modernization of our submarines, which deliver and launch those, potentially, missiles, is a key priority for the national defense in terms of the Ohio-class?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, the replacement of the Ohio SSBN is critical to our nuclear deterrent strategy and capability.

Senator REED. We are committed, I believe, to maintain the triad of air-launched missiles as well as ground-launched missiles, but since we have the bulk of our assets at sea in terms of warheads, that would seem to me to be sort of the first priority in terms of modernization of the delivery system at least. Is that consistent with your views and the strategy?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, first, the flexibility of having a triad is also very important to our deterrence strategy. Since the Ohio-class platform is nearing its end of life, it is very important that we replace it in addition to the calculus you just mentioned.

Senator REED. One of the things that is going to be required is support from the Department of Defense to do that because the issues you deal with cut across Service lines. There has to be, I think, a national commitment to modernization of the whole triad. But, again, since most of our—with no pun intended—eggs are in these submarines, we have to do that first and we have to do it with defense-wide resources. Is that your view too?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, it is not in my purview as far as how they are paid for in terms of defense-wide, but very important that we in fact move forward with that critical platform.

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Admiral.

Just a final question. We are in the midst of a doctrinal shift similar to the late 1970s and early 1980s when we developed the air-land doctrine. Now it is the air-sea battle. You gentlemen will be in the midst of that. General Scaparrotti will be in Asia in South Korea, and the bulk of our pivot diplomatically and strategically is towards the Asia-Pacific area. The air-sea battle is comparable in terms of that doctrine.

One of the key factors that we did not have to worry about quite as much back in the 1970s–1980s with the air-land battle was cyber. As part of your responsibility, are you fully worked in—you and your staff—with developing this new doctrine particularly when it comes to cyber?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, if I have your question right, you are asking relative to air-sea battle and cyber. I would say that the air-sea battle is a concept. It is a concept I work in my current capacity as the Commander of the Pacific Fleet across the Joint Services and with the Pacific Command Commander, Admiral Locklear, and his team. It includes all of our capabilities and effort to include cyber.

Senator REED. Let me go ahead and I will, for the record, ask additional questions on this point. But a concern I have is that, air power, sea power—we have been doing that for about 200 years. This is a brand new, relatively speaking, dimension. It seems also, given what we have read in the press, that some of our potential competitors have very sophisticated asymmetric powers with respect to cyber. When we develop this air-sea battle—and it will pertain to General Scaparrotti too—we have to make sure that we can communicate, that we can command, we can control, et cetera. That might be the most key aspect of this new doctrine. I would hope that you and your command would be very much engaged in it.

Let me turn to General Scaparrotti now. General, we have a series of joint exercises with the South Korean forces in Foal Eagle, Key Resolve, and others. Can you give me just a preliminary estimate of, one, their value and, two, your intentions going forward with these joint exercises?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, these exercises, they are large, they are joint, they are combined. We do those regularly throughout the year. I think they are essential to the readiness that we need to maintain on the peninsula. I also think they are essential in terms of the integration that we are trying to attain and the improvement in both our forces and of Republic of Korea (ROK) forces. The very milestones that are laid out in Strategic Alliance 2015, for instance, can be best tested and developed through the use of those exercises because those are the times when we can bring together all of the Services as well as combined forces of both us and the ROK military.

Senator REED. Again, as has been mentioned before in previous questions, one of the key actors that influence the Korean Peninsula is China. Recently, they have made some statements or the statements have been attributed to them as suggesting to the world and to the North Koreans that their ultimate goal is denuclearization, which would be a positive step forward. Just in general, your view on their role and your view of how you can help facilitate the diplomacy between not just South Korea and the United States but South Korea, China, Japan, and the United States.

General SCAPARROTTI. Yes, sir. I agree. I think China is key to the influence here on North Korea. As a part of my present duties as Director of the Joint Staff, I took part in the talks that were just held with China on economics and security, and they did make the commitment to a denuclearized peninsula.

I think, if confirmed in my next duty, I have a relationship now that I have begun to establish with the deputy chief of staff of Chinese forces. They know me. Second, in terms of my position, if confirmed, I also have that military-to-military relationship that I will develop with South Korea and with the other countries in the region. I think those military-to-military relationships are very important to progressing to our objective of denuclearization of the peninsula.

Senator REED. Thank you very much, sir. Thank you, gentlemen.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Reed.

Senator Ayotte?

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank you, Admiral Haney and General Scaparrotti, for your service and for the sacrifice of your families too. We appreciate it.

I wanted to follow up, Admiral Haney, on the question that Senator Inhofe asked you about reduction of our nuclear deterrent and particularly our deployed strategic nuclear weapons.

The President recently did announce that he was going to seek a one-third reduction of our deployed strategic nuclear weapons. It was not clear in his speech at all whether that was something that he would only accept through negotiated reductions with countries like Russia or whether this would be something he would consider doing unilaterally.

If you were to seek to do that unilaterally, what would your advice be to him on a unilateral reduction of our nuclear deterrent?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, thank you for that question.

My advice would be that we negotiate a bilateral agreement that also has verifiable components to it so that we can ensure that the said reduction would work.

Senator AYOTTE. Just to be clear, you would oppose a unilateral reduction?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, that is correct.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you.

How important do you believe it is before we seek any further reductions that we fulfill the modernization requirements of the New START treaty in section 1043? I know that you were well aware, of course, as the deputy commander of those requirements that you have already been asked about. How important do you believe that we fulfill that modernization requirement before we seek further reductions?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think it is very important that we modernize our industrial base in order to maintain and sustain the weapons that we have. Each will be even more critical as you reduce the number. It is so important that we have a secure and a safe and effective nuclear deterrent, and that industrial base supports that.

Senator AYOTTE. If we are continuing to diminish the resources toward our modernization efforts, which is essentially what is happening right now under the New START treaty, do you think it is advisable that we further reduce our nuclear deterrent without meeting those responsibilities?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think the reductions relative to the New START treaty, as agreed upon, is satisfactory. I believe from the knowledge I have—I do not currently work in that business, but from what I understand, for the fiscal year 2014 budget, the President's budget supports the modernization of that industrial base. With sequestration, it is a question in my mind to how well we will be able to do that with further cuts across the board in all our accounts to include this modernization you mentioned.

Senator AYOTTE. My point is this, when the President announces that he is going to seek a third reduction, it seems to me that unless we further fulfill our commitments to modernize our current deterrent pursuant to the existing treaty obligations, then that would, in my view, not be advisable particularly if we do not know that we have modernized what we have now, which we know is important to do to make sure it works.

In that regard, I wanted to ask you about the recent Missile Defense Agency test that the chairman asked you about of the CE1 kill vehicle. One of the issues that I see with that is that this issue of our missile defense program needs to be prioritized. In fact, is it not true that the last time the CE1 kill vehicle had been tested was 2008?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, it is my understanding that the CE1 has gone through a number of tests, and as a result of the combined tests, it is an effective and operational capability today.

Senator AYOTTE. The first flight test we have had, General, was since 2008. Here we are, 2013, and the last time we had a flight test of it was 2008. It seems to me that if we are going to have a commitment to our missile defense and making sure that the capabilities are there, that we need to put resources in it that are going to further testing. In fact, what troubles me is the administration, even prior to sequestration, was cutting funding for this program.

As we go forward, what do you believe the priorities should be in terms of making sure that our missile defense programs are supported?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, my priorities would be the day we invest in sensors, we invest in reliability of the missiles that we are using, both CE1 and CE2, and we do adequate testing to ensure that reliability exists.

Senator AYOTTE. With regard to an east coast missile defense site, you said to the chairman that you felt that there were further analysis of the missile threat to Iran. Do you dispute what has been the report from the National Air and Space Intelligence Center from earlier this month that concluded Iran could develop and test an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) capable of reaching the United States by 2015?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I am not here to dispute what you just said.

Senator AYOTTE. What further analysis do we need to conduct? We missed it when it came to the North Korean nuclear threat, and I would hate to see us in that position with regard to Iran. Would you agree with me that if we had an east coast site, particularly with the cancelation of the SM–3 Block 2B program, that it would provide additional battle space in response to an ICBM missile from Iran to the east coast of the United States?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I believe we have to continue to study how we are going to address that. As I mentioned earlier and truly believe, that we have to also get the sensing right so that as we fire our individual missiles to address this problem, that we have the right targeting with that. I also support, as far as the east coast launch site, that we move forward with the environmental impact statement (EIS) in order to allow us an option in the future.

Senator AYOTTE. General, my time is up, but I will follow up because in the written answers and also to the chairman you have talked about additional analysis about the Iran threat. With the reports that 2015 is when they may have ICBM capability, I am not sure what we are waiting for around here for additional analysis because we know, even with the EIS going forward, it will take several years for us to stand that type of site up, and by then, they have the missile and the east coast does not have the battle space opportunity that it should have to fully protect the east coast of the Nation. I appreciate it, and I will follow up with you on that.

I want to thank you both. I will have a follow-up for the record with you, General Scaparrotti. I appreciate it.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

Senator Udall?

Senator UDALL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Good morning, gentlemen. I want to also add my voice to the members of the committee to thank you, and I think more importantly, you all agree, your families for your service and the way in which you have been supported by them.

Admiral Haney, I chair the Strategic Forces Subcommittee. I look forward to working with you in that capacity, when you are confirmed, on these important issues that have not only military but historical significance.

General Scaparrotti, it is good to see you again. I know we are going to work together too given the proclivities of the North Korean leadership and the challenges that you will face as the head of USFK.

Admiral Haney, if I could turn to you initially, and I want to pursue the same line of questioning you have been hearing this morning from all of us. Are you confident that the President's proposal to reduce the number of deployed strategic nuclear weapons will allow us to maintain an effective nuclear deterrent and to be able to fully respond to a nuclear attack?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I fully support, as stated in my earlier questioning, that the New START treaty numbers make sense to me and that we ought to continue to march toward that goal.

I also fundamentally believe that we should always, as good stewards, look for the right balance in all of our capability. I have not studied this piece, and if so confirmed, I would be willing to come back to this committee in a classified setting to further address this balance of our capability that we will need for the future.

Senator UDALL. Let me follow that with a question, and I think you can respond up to a point, given this is an open hearing.

If reductions were made, we would be able to maintain those weapons that were reduced in a status that would allow them to be redeployed if a situation demanded. Is that correct?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, it would really depend on any future agreement that we would have in terms of what were the basis and parts and components of said agreement relative to what we would retain and what we would not.

Senator UDALL. Some of the present agreements, if I am correct, do allow that, though, as an option. Is that fair to say? Some of the treaties that are in place today.

Admiral HANEY. Yes, sir, that is my understanding.

Senator UDALL. The weapons are kept in a warm status if they are kept in a stockpile?

Admiral HANEY. That is correct. The New START treaty addresses both deployed and nondeployed warheads and also addresses launchers.

Senator UDALL. Talk about the benefits, as you see them, that are associated with the proposed changes to our nuclear employment strategy. Do you believe the benefits, in other words, outweigh the risks?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I believe the benefits relative to the New START treaty provide us the adequate numbers of nuclear weapons and launchers to address the threats now and into the future.

Senator UDALL. Let me move to modern conventional weapons. There are some who I respect and I think many respect who say that modern conventional weapons have provided us with the capabilities that once would have been required by nuclear weapons. Am I correct in saying because of those advanced conventional weapons, we simply do not need as many nukes as we once did to accomplish the same objective?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I would say that as you look at the number of nukes, our combined capability is also important as a country. When you look at how many nukes we had—nuclear weapons—during the Cold War and just the significant quantities we have had, if you were to look at that graph from about the 1950s on, it is pretty interesting in how we have made significant reductions while still retaining quite a few weapons.

I fundamentally believe that we have to be careful and look at all of our capability, similar to what was stated in the Nuclear Posture Review in 2010, that that is also part of our country's capability and what we can bring to bear if so threatened. But as long as other countries have nuclear weapons, we are required to have a safe, secure, and effective means to address that.

Senator UDALL. I think we all agree on that point. You are saying that the conventional arsenal that we have today is advanced and it complements our nuclear weapons capability as well. Is that what you are saying?

Admiral HANEY. It complements. What I am also saying is I do not have a magic equation that says this number of precision guided munitions equal this capability because we are talking about a significant difference in destructive capability when we look at a nuclear weapon.

Senator UDALL. Admiral, let us turn to the modernization of the B–61 bomb. Do you support that current modernization plan? What would be the consequences if the United States did not modernize the B–61?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think the B–61–12 modernization program is very important to our Nation, and I fully support it. I also believe that we will be at risk if we do not support it because through its modernization, it also reduces the number of other nuclear weapons that we have today and brings it down to one type model series for nuclear surety and in order to have a safe, secure platform for our use, but particularly in terms of the tactical nukes associated with our dual-capable aircraft program.

Senator UDALL. You paid me the honor of a visit and we talked about this particular plan. We also talked about your willingness to work with Senator Sessions, who is my ranking member on the subcommittee, and myself to bring down the costs of the B–61–12 program. I heard you imply but I want to make sure for the record that you have a chance to clarify further. You will work with us to bring down that price tag and do everything possible to create some efficiencies. Is that correct?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, if so confirmed, I will work hard to look at costs in every program STRATCOM is associated with.

Senator UDALL. Thank you for that answer.

Chairman LEVIN. Let me interrupt you, Senator Udall. We only have a minute left in this vote. There was a miscommunication here. At any rate, we are right at the end of the vote. We only have about 5 minutes to get there. We are going to have to recess for 10 minutes or so because none of us have voted yet. We will call the cloak rooms and let them know that we are on our way. We are going to have to recess. Sorry to interrupt you. If you get back, then we owe you a minute or 2.

Senator UDALL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay. We are going to hold off on that. Senator Donnelly is here and he can continue.

Do you want to finish?

Senator UDALL. Could I just finish the question for the record, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman LEVIN. Sure.

Senator UDALL. Then I would be happy to defer to my wise colleague from the Hoosier State, Senator Donnelly.

I will ask this for the record, Admiral. On the issue of electromagnetic (EM) spectrum management, I think you are well aware of the discussion that is underway. I think if we had public access to that bandwidth, it would be a great economic benefit. I know we also cannot negatively affect DOD mission.

Do you believe that the lower 25 megahertz of that spectrum could be vacated within the currently proposed timeline without unduly affecting our military and our military missions?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think as we go forward here in the electronic spectrum, as much as it is also becoming extremely utilized, that we have to be very careful that costs associated with taking the EM spectrum away in areas where the military is using right now because there will be a cost associated with migrating those equipments to a different EM band.

Senator UDALL. I hear caution in your answer but I want to continue to work with you on this important what I think is opportunity but we also have to do it right.

Thanks again, gentlemen, to both of you. I look forward to working with you after you are confirmed. Thank you.

Senator Donnelly?

Senator DONNELLY [presiding]. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It is great to be with both of you. I want to thank you for your service to the country and to your families for everything you have done on behalf of this Nation. We are very grateful to all of you.

Last Saturday, July 27, marked the 60th anniversary of the Korean War armistice. I would like to recognize our servicemembers who currently serve and have served in the Republic of Korea and thank them for their service.

One such Korean War veteran was Army Lieutenant Colonel Don Faith, a Hoosier who was posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor and was buried in Arlington Cemetery just recently. His body was recovered from North Korea in 2004 as part of a joint U.S.-Democratic People's Republic of Korea recovery team.

Currently 5,500 U.S. servicemembers are still missing in action in North Korea. General Scaparrotti, what conditions are necessary for resuming recovery operations in North Korea so our missing-in-action soldiers can be brought home to their families?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, first let me say that I fully support efforts for repatriation of our servicemembers, their remains. It is an obligation that we have, I believe, as a Nation. If confirmed as the U.N. Commander, as a part of those duties, I will have particular duties regarding the arrangements for the repatriation of remains.

I think in terms of what we should do, I think to go forward, we should ensure that it is within the priority of our other national interests and, second, that we can assure the security of those individuals that we would put into North Korea to retrieve the remains and do the operation there.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you.

Admiral Haney, recently the National Air and Space Intelligence Center put out a report regarding ballistic missile systems and said China has the most active and diverse ballistic missile development program in the world. It is developing and testing offensive missiles, forming additional missile units, qualitatively upgrading missile systems, and developing methods to counter ballistic missile defenses.

When we look at that and we know that with our missile defense systems, the last three tests have failed, how do we rectify that situation?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, as we look to the future here, it is very important that we are able to continue to work our missile defense solutions across the board but, in particular, to get our GBI solution set operating with the confidence we expect. We have had numerous tests over the years of the CE1 variant and it is operational, and it is operational to the extent that it is currently protecting our country. As we look at the future, it is important that we get the CE2 portion of this also correct and that we look at the full range of options as we look at addressing the missile defense threat.

Senator DONNELLY. One of the other concerns that I have is, as we look at the east coast missile defense system more, the suggestion of whether or not we need one, folks have said there is no point in going further with that because we do not have the other system even working right. I think we are able to do two things at one time. Do you see a need for an east coast missile defense system?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I see a need for us to look at other options, options in general, of how we address this problem. I am fully supportive of moving forward with the environmental impact statement, which is fully supported, as we go forward while at the same time making sure we get our sensing right so that we can further refine our capability in terms of being able to attack these missiles with our current programs.

Senator DONNELLY. You were kind enough when we met to talk a little bit about this issue with me, but I just wanted to mention it again and that is in regards to counterfeit parts. It is an extraordinarily dangerous situation when these parts are used in equipment that protects our soldiers, that our servicemembers depend on.

Is there a way to use facilities like Crane Naval Warfare Center in Indiana to minimize DOD's risk of receiving counterfeit parts in the military supply chain?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think it is very important that we continue to work hard as a country and as a military to look and avoid counterfeit parts. This is a very important area as we look at our current posture but also as we look at the future with the number of systems with chips of various capabilities in so much of our military apparatus.

With regards to how we do that, if so confirmed, this is an area I will look at and from that standpoint, if so confirmed, come back to you relative to Crane. I have not been to Crane. This is one of the areas in the early months, if so confirmed, that I will want to get around to see our various capabilities in the country and be able to address that more formally.

Senator DONNELLY. We would be honored to have you come.

General, in regards to North Korea's ballistic missile systems, what do you think their intent is?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, I think North Korea has an aggressive ballistic missile program. They have hundreds of short- and medium-range missiles. They are developing intermediate-range and ICBMs. They see that as prestige for their regime. They see it as a means of extending the regime's security. They see it as a manner of deterrence against the United States and our influence in the region, as well as the other regional partners. I think the regime itself sees their ballistic missile systems as very important.

In recent years, their conventional forces have been declining in capability, and it is the money that they are putting into asymmetric systems like the ballistic missile system, their special forces, cyber, et cetera that I think they have changed their strategy toward us.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you very much, General, Admiral. Thank you both for your service.

Mrs. Fischer?

Senator FISCHER. Thank you, Senator.

Thank you, Admiral, and thank you, General, for being here today, and I thank you for your service. I thank your families for their sacrifice through the years. I can see you should be very proud of the families that you have raised while serving your country. Thank you very much.

Admiral, I want to thank you again for taking the time to come and visit me in my office. I thought we had a great discussion, and I would like to just follow up, if I could, a little bit on the issues that we touched upon in my office.

I had asked you about our relationship with Russia and your views on that relationship, but we did not have the opportunity to discuss their views on missile defense. I would ask you, how do you think the United States should deal with the Russians' repeated demands for legal limits on our missile defenses? How do you define the term "legal limits"?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I do believe, as we have articulated from the Nuclear Posture Review and the Ballistic Missile Defense Review and continued on a journey, we have continued to articulate how our missile defense system is designed to be a limited missile defense system that should not be conceived as a threat to Russia's deterrence capability.

I think as we continue to work with the Russians, we will have to continue the dialogues that have been started to continue to make sure their questions are in fact answered, but at the same time, we have to be mindful that it is important that we defend and have adequate capability to defend our assets, both deployed and our Homeland. As I see Russia, that is also a country that is doing some investment in their capability. The combination of continuing to have discussions and negotiations I think is important for our future.

In terms of defining the legal limit piece, that is an area, if so confirmed, I would like to look at more closely and come back to you.

Senator FISCHER. Do you believe that it should be our decision as a country, as a Nation, on where we deploy our defense systems and the numbers that we use in those deployments?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think it is important, as we deploy any of our capability, that we work through our associated analysis as well as work with our allies and partners and countries like Russia in terms of how we come with an integral solution. But as we do that, we clearly have to prioritize what we are trying to achieve is part of that calculus.

Senator FISCHER. Do you believe that we should support or do you support sharing classified data on our missile defenses with the Russians? If so, would you draw a line and where would you draw the line on how much to share?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, that is a very good question. The business, in terms of information sharing, is one that has to be looked at closely, both looked at from a standpoint of how we look at the world today and how we look at the world in the future. I think as we look at information sharing, which we do with a variety of countries on different subjects, for missile defense, that is one that, again, has limits and bounds. As I sit before you, I could not in an unclassified forum talk about that but would look forward, if so confirmed, in the future to have an opportunity to continue that discussion.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you. I appreciate your offering to do that. I think it is an important point and it is one that we need to have a conversation about. I thank you for that.

You mentioned that you support more testing for missile defense. Do you believe that our current budget can adequately do that? Do you think we need more resources, especially given some recent test failures? What would you advise if you are confirmed?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, if so confirmed, this will be an area that I would want to look at closely. Number one, whenever we talk about adding more resources, it is very important first we look at what our resources we currently have are doing for us, and I am a big believer that we have to be careful before we just come out and ask for more without doing some rigorous reviews of what we are spending money on.

I do believe, though, when we look at testing, testing covers a full gamut, partially testing that you can do without launching in space as you narrow down and do the analysis associated with componentry. I know this last test is under review and, until so confirmed, I am unable to see the results of that work, it is hard for me to give you an answer that would be substantial. I look forward to that, if so confirmed, in the future.

Senator FISCHER. I would assume from some of your previous statements, though, that you do believe that we need to have equipment that is going to work and make sure that it can do the job. Is that correct?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, that is very important for us to be able to achieve for the future of the defense of our country and for our deployed forces as well as our allies.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you.

We talked a little bit about the new facility that is being constructed at STRATCOM in my State and that hopefully it is on schedule and it will continue to move forward at the speed that it needs to move forward at so that we can update the resources that we have there at STRATCOM. Do you have anything you want to add on that about the value that that facility will have for STRATCOM? I know you were assigned to STRATCOM. I believe it was in 2010. You are familiar with the area, and I know you are familiar with the planning of that facility. What would you add to that and the value that it has for the mission?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, thank you for that question.

The command and control complex that is being built right now is very important to our Nation in terms of all the missions of STRATCOM and, in particular, strategic deterrence. It is important, as we have talked about here, the warheads, the weapons, the platforms, and the sensors, but without the command and control that connects the relevant information to our leadership, the decisions could not be made in a prompt time. That is such an important part of our infrastructure and capability going forward.

I thank Congress for its support for that command and control complex.

Senator FISCHER. Thank you, Admiral. I look forward to working with you to make sure that it continues to move forward. Thank you very much.

Thank you, Senator.

Chairman LEVIN [presiding]. Thank you, Senator Fischer.

Now I believe that Senator King is next.

Senator KING. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Gentlemen, thank you very much for your service to the country and your joining us this morning.

Admiral Haney, I have heard a number of witnesses over the course of the past 6 or 7 months characterize cyber as the most serious, immediate threat that we face. The term I have heard, which stuck with me, was the next Pearl Harbor will probably be cyber.

Given that, do you think that the Cyber Command, which is under your proposed command, should be set apart and elevated to its own unified combatant command?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I am a fan of a command and control structure that allows us to win would be my first overarching statement.

As we look at how we are aligned today with Cyber Command as a sub-unified command under STRATCOM, I believe the work is ongoing and in fact is working in a very synchronized fashion with delegated responsibilities to U.S. Cyber Command.

My first principle would be the first part that we have to keep intact is the National Security Agency and Cyber Command under the same hat, as we have it today, and that that synergy is so important to our country going into the future. That piece we have to continue and we have to get it right. As we look at a future and particularly as we grow our cyber capability, I believe there may come a time where Cyber Command as a separate combatant command will be appropriate. But I think as we are applying our next dollars in terms of the manpower we need to address this threat and in terms of the tool sets we need to address this threat, that that is important because as we do step into moving Cyber Command as its own combatant command, there is also a price to be paid there as well in overhead. Right now, I think we are fine in our current alignment but I am not opposed for some time in the future for Cyber Command to become its own combatant command.

Senator KING. Since the 1950s, our strategy with regard to nuclear weapons has been deterrence, mutually assured destruction, and that presumes a level of rationality in one's enemy. What is our strategy for deterrence of madmen with nuclear weapons, people that are not necessarily rational, whether they are state or particularly non-state actors? What is our sort of overall strategic thinking about, as I say, particularly non-state actors who at some point in the reasonably near future may be able to obtain nuclear weapons?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think that is an area particularly where the Nuclear Posture Review of 2010 articulated a strategy which we continue, point one being that it is important that our efforts in terms of combating weapons of mass destruction continue. We have had the initial operating capability of the standing joint force headquarters for elimination, for example, in the business of having that capability, the business of being able to have our country's capability of knowing where the nuclear weapons, as well as the other weapons of mass destruction, are and to work hard to avoid having this kind of capability fall in the wrong hands.

Senator KING. It is an intelligence function. Is that what you are saying? Principally our defense against non-state nuclear weapons is essentially knowing who has them and how to prevent them?

Admiral HANEY. I think, Senator, this is also in the spirit of reducing the number of weapons that exist in the world. It has been part of that Nuclear Posture Review and the strategy that our country has been striving to achieve. It is not just an intelligence function. It is a whole-of-government function. It is a function that STRATCOM is also heavily involved in to detect, deter, and prevent utilization of that type of weapons.

Senator KING. But you understand what I am saying. The strategy of deterrence may work with Russia but an Iranian terrorist cell who thinks that if they die in a holy war, they are going to go straight to heaven—deterrence is not necessarily a viable strategy. What is the strategy?

Admiral HANEY. The strategy is to continue to work across our whole-of-government apparatus in terms of ensuring that countries that harbor folks that want to do harm to us in whatever means—there is some work that occurs diplomatically. There is work that occurs militarily. This business of knowing where things are is also a very important part of that strategy to address the threat in addition to the elimination of that threat.

Senator KING. Thank you.

General, in the full preparation of our committee, I want you to know that we are preparing you today for Korean winters—the air conditioning in this room. We want you to be ready for cold weather. [Laughter.]

General SCAPARROTTI. Thank you, sir.

Senator KING. This past Saturday I had the honor to visit with a number of Korean War veterans at the 60th anniversary of the signing of the treaty at Panmunjom. I have a little statement. Of course, you know Korea is often characterized as "the forgotten war". But in looking at the situation where we have a very vigorous country of 50 million people in the south and a miserable despotism in the north, I cannot think of too many wars that made as much difference as that war did if you look at the stark difference on the two sides of that narrow line. It certainly should not be a forgotten war.

A question that I am sure you are going to have to deal with in the next several months is, to what extent is the sequester going to affect readiness in Korea?

General SCAPARROTTI. Senator, I think it will affect readiness in Korea at some point. Presently USFK enjoys a very high priority in terms of funding and resources. Just after the forces deployed in harm's way, Korea is on that level because we have to be ready to fight in Korea tonight. It is that uncertain. We have enjoyed that kind of funding.

If confirmed, I intend to keep a very close watch on our readiness levels, the resources that we have. I think my concern would be as we reduce our funding, particularly if we go into full sequestration, we know that we have seen a reduction in the forces now already or their readiness, and that would be extended into the next year and, of course, become worse over time. The forces in Korea depend on potentially a rotation of forces, but certainly the forces that would come forward if there is conflict on the peninsula. I think that is the impact as we look to the future.

Senator KING. I hope perhaps for the record you could provide some analysis—because it is now looking more and more like full sequester in 2014 is a likelihood if not a certainty—of what the impact would be and how it would be allocated because it is very important for us to know, as we are debating and discussing sequester and what the alternatives are, that we have a realistic picture of the impact. My understanding, from talking to other people in the Pentagon, is that the sequester in 2014 is going to be a much more serious, widespread impact than it was in 2013 because of the lack of low-hanging fruit, if you will, of unexpended funds and those kinds of things. It is going to be a higher level of impact. Perhaps for the record you can give us some serious analysis of the impact on Korea. We need to have that information.

General SCAPARROTTI. Senator, presently we already see the impact on readiness just in this fiscal year, as you mentioned, in fiscal year 2013. You know that the Army has the majority of its brigades now at a lower training level focusing on company-level training, for instance. For those brigades who are either not deployed or those who are about to deploy, those two categories maintain the training levels they need to be ready for that deployment. But all other brigades have come to a lower proficiency level and resourcing.

The Air Force, you are aware, has already grounded 12 air squadrons, as I understand it. The Navy has cut back on ships going to sea and the maintenance that they are providing. That is the short term.

But as we take those cuts today, you will see a much deeper cut in readiness as we go into 2014 and beyond because that begins to compound itself. Pilots who have not flown take much longer to get back up to combat proficiency. Brigades who have not trained in the fundamentals, particularly the integration of combined arms at a higher level, take much longer to train and it is more expensive. I think as time goes on, we see our readiness coming down and that is of concern.

How does that impact USFK? First of all, it is the forces that we may rotate there. They would take longer to be ready for the mission that they are going to do. If it were forces that had to be deployed in response to, say, a provocation, we would probably take some time here in the States to train that unit to the readiness level that we believe they need to be at to do the job before they deploy. Arriving forces might be delayed as a result.

Senator KING. Thank you. I appreciate that, and any additional information you could provide us for the record would be helpful. Thank you.

General SCAPARROTTI. I will, sir. Thank you.

[The information referred to follows:]

I will continue to review and evaluate the readiness of U.S. Forces in Korea and what impact, if any, full sequester could have on those forces.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator King.

Senator McCain?

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Admiral Haney, you will be leaving the command of the Pacific fleet. How is the littoral combat ship working out?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, we had the USS Freedom deployed today in the western Pacific.

Senator MCCAIN. Based out of Singapore?

Admiral HANEY. Operating out of Singapore, sir. In fact, it has been involved in a variety of exercises and operations since it has been out there.

We also have two other littoral combat ships, the Independence and the Fort Worth, that are operating out of San Diego and working, in the Independence's case, the mine warfare module. I am happy to report we have three out in the Pacific today, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. My question was how is it working out?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, it is working out very well in terms of our ability to take this first platform, a research and development model, and get it out in the Pacific to do real work. Clearly with it, we have learned a lot, but we are right now about to swap the second crew to that platform about halfway through its 8 months deployment in the case of the Freedom. The other two are continuing to work through the various——

Senator MCCAIN. I would like for the third time to ask you how is it working out. Are you satisfied with its performance? Are the modules being replaced on time? Are the cost estimates what they should be? Please answer the question, Admiral.

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I would——

Senator MCCAIN. I can get a status report whenever I want one. I want to know your view as to how the littoral combat ship is working out as far as its ability to defend our interests in the Pacific.

Admiral HANEY. Senator, currently it is working out very well from an ability to deploy it and get it to do its work. The platform itself, both varieties, have moved forward, and my personal view is that that part is also working out well. We have learned some things that have been incorporated from Freedom, LCS–1 to LCS–3, and those improvements I believe are right on target.

If there is one area that requires more work and that we have been working as a Navy to get there is the mission modules of the different varieties. The current module deployed with the littoral combat ship number one is working fine, and it is a little early for me to give you the prognosis on the Independence mine warfare mission module, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. General, there have been plans to move our troops in South Korea to a base further away from Seoul. How is that progressing?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, presently those plans are underway. They are being worked with our ROK counterparts as well. Primarily right now, we are making plans for the ability to make those moves to——

Senator MCCAIN. Have we gotten cost estimates yet as to how and who would bear those costs?

General SCAPARROTTI. Yes, sir, there are cost estimates at this point. It is shared costs with our ROK counterparts as well as our own payment. I am aware of the issues with the cost today. As I said, we are——

Senator MCCAIN. Roughly what costs are we talking about to complete the contemplated move?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, in terms of the Land Partnership Plan, which is the one that we pay probably the most part of, it is about $880 million for our portion of that Land Partnership Plan move, and that has to do with the forces north of Seoul.

The Yongsan Relocation Plan is a plan paid primarily by the Republic of Korea for the move of the services and the forces right around Yongsan in the headquarters area.

Senator MCCAIN. Now in, "paying for the move," does that mean paying for all of the installation that is necessary there?

General SCAPARROTTI. My term, sir. In those plans, it is the payment for the construction of facilities to support the troops, and there is also housing included in this as well for families, et cetera.

Senator MCCAIN. Do you think it is a wise move at this time for the South Koreans to reopen that facility, manufacturing area, north of the Demilitarized Zone?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, I think that if the two countries can come to terms on their agreements and, as South Korea said, so that it would not be used as leverage again, that is a platform that can be used then to perhaps develop communication and reduce the tension between North Korea and South Korea.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank the witnesses.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator McCain.

Senator Blumenthal?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you both for your service, your extraordinary careers of service, to our Nation. Thank you to your families as well for their contribution and service.

Let me begin, Admiral Haney, by asking you about the Ohio-class ballistic missile submarines. I know that you have today, in fact, called then critical to our national defense, and yet as you also know, the program has been delayed by at least 2 years. Is that a wise move?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, the delay with the program has incurred some risk, and that is a risk that we are working through. I would say we can ill-afford to have another delay with this program.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Another delay would be unacceptable?

Admiral HANEY. That is correct, Senator. Particularly as you look at the aging of the current platform that is beginning to reach its end of life, 42 years is a long time to be operating a submarine.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. My understanding is that the official explanation has been that the delay will enable more refined development of the weapons platform, of the technology, and ultimately some prospect of cost savings. Is that the reasons that you understand the delay has been implemented?

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think the delay was implemented for some of that, but it was also a matter of prioritization of resources.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Cost savings, in other words, the unavailability of funds.

Admiral HANEY. Yes, Senator.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. In a more perfect world—not a perfect world necessarily, but a more ideal world, that program would be implemented without the delay.

Admiral HANEY. Senator, that is correct. I will say I know that there is some work that continues to go on in research and development and design development for that platform. I think in the interim time, good work continues.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. If possible, though, we would recalculate and eliminate that delay, if possible.

Admiral HANEY. Senator, I think we have already started the delay, and you cannot make up for what is already lost. We are already in that phase.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But there is no question that we need that Ohio-class ballistic missile submarine and that we need to provide sufficient resources without additional delay.

Admiral HANEY. Senator, that is correct.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. General, if I could ask a few more questions about the relocation. Given the stringency—and you have heard a number of my colleagues talk about the possible continuing of the sequester even though many like myself believe that it would be unwise and really unjustified to apply it as it would be to the defense budget—can you tell me whether canceling the relocation is an option that perhaps we should consider?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, I cannot say for sure whether that would be an option we would consider. It seems to me that we have made, as a part of the Strategic Alliance 2015, agreements with our ROK allies, and those moves are tied to that. From the position I am in now, I cannot really comment on whether that is really an option.

But I would say too that those moves help us posture our forces better. To the extent that we can continue on that line, my judgment is it would be good for the readiness of the force as well.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. You have said it would be good. It is essential for the readiness of the force?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, if confirmed, I will certainly review that and be willing to come back to you. I do not believe that from this position I have the capability to answer that question fully, but I will be able to once I am on the ground and I can see the impact of both the moves and also the importance with respect to our bilateral agreements.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Do you have an estimate as to what the cost of canceling or delaying the relocation would be?

General SCAPARROTTI. No, sir, I do not.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Would you be able to provide one to the committee?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, if confirmed, I am willing to provide one to the committee.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you. I would appreciate that.

Currently, I understand a reliable cost estimate for cancelling the transformation initiatives does not exist. With that said, I understand that there would be potential political sensitivities with our Republic of Korea allies if this effort is cancelled, as they are paying for over 90 percent of the costs of the Yongsan Relocation Plan and Land Partnership Plan. Additionally, over $500 million of U.S. Military Construction has been invested in building infrastructure to support the relocation efforts.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I must say I do not have too much doubt you will be confirmed. I expect you have heard much the same from others on this committee. I certainly will be supporting you in that vote.

What is the overall cost of the project? I have heard the number $10 billion.

General SCAPARROTTI. Of that project?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Yes. I am sorry. Of the relocation project.

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, again, I would like to come back on the record. I have heard a lower number than that, but I do not know if that is the entire cost of the project.

The total U.S. and ROK costs of the Yongsan Relocation Plan and Land Partnership Plan initiatives are $10.7 billion.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Finally, we hear a lot about readiness and about the impact of sequester on readiness. Could you maybe, to give us a little bit more concrete or factual basis for what the impact is, talk about what the effect is on the troops on the ground in Korea who will be under your command, the captains and lieutenants, the sergeants and staff sergeants, how their everyday training, life, and so forth is affected?

General SCAPARROTTI. Sir, if I could, I would like to take that as a general question, not specific to USFK.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Sure.

General SCAPARROTTI. I have done some checking but I have not checked with those serving today in Korea. Second, they enjoy a very high resource category right now.

But across the force, the reduction thus far in resources and the impact of sequester has resulted in the reduction of training that is being done. The troops are training every day but they are training at a much lower level.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I know I have heard this numerous times, which is why I wanted to specify it to Korea. Does that mean that they are out in the field less, that they are sitting in classrooms rather than firing live rounds somewhere?

General SCAPARROTTI. They may be in the field less. They are likely going to the range less. They are likely qualifying with weapons systems and the vehicle systems that they have less. The pilots are likely flying less.

Now, you asked about morale. That also impacts morale because our young men and women are very proficient. They are very experienced. They know what it takes to be ready for combat across all the Services. They have been in a fight for 10 years. So when we start to delay their ability to reach or maintain that kind of proficiency, it affects their morale as well. Also, they are concerned about their future in our force.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

My time has expired but I think this topic obviously is supremely important. I want to thank both of you for your very helpful and insightful answers. Thank you very much.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Blumenthal.

I just have one additional question for you, General Scaparrotti. It has to do with the various approaches to the intense determination of all of us to reduce the number of sexual assaults and inappropriate sexual conduct.

Given your experience at West Point and as a commander, should we take the chain of command out of that decision to prosecute courts martial?

General SCAPARROTTI. Senator, thank you.

I strongly believe that we should not take the commander out of the process in terms of dealing with disciplinary issues, in particular in this case, sexual assault. In the military, the commander is central to all that we do. The commander, in fact, is held responsible for his unit, all that it does or fails to do, and he or she is the most important person establishing the climate within that command of whatever size it is. It is the climate in my opinion that is fundamental to preventing sexual harassment and sexual assault. They are key to that.

I believe strongly that our commanders take this seriously and that we can through training, through oversight, some of the initiatives that have been presented by members of this committee, perhaps some legislation, that can also help us strengthen our ability to deal with this with our commanders in the chain of command.

In the end, I would just say I think it is a matter of integrity. We entrust them with great responsibility, special trust as it says in their obligation that they take, and we entrust them with the lives of our young men and women. To not trust them with a portion of this to me does not follow through with what we say and then what we do. I say that we hold them accountable, train them properly and give them the tools to do that oversight, and then maintain integrity of the system.

Chairman LEVIN. Any other questions?

Senator INHOFE. One.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Inhofe?

Senator INHOFE. Yes, just one follow-up.

I appreciate your answer very much to that question, General. Did you happen to see the compromise that the chairman and I and this committee put together that would maintain the integrity of the commander but also give some relief in the event that some abuse takes place? Did you see that?

General SCAPARROTTI. I did, Senator.

Senator INHOFE. What do you think about that?

General SCAPARROTTI. I agree with that. As I said, I think there are some initiatives here that have been proposed that retain the commander in the process, but there are things that we can do in Article 60, for instance, which I think yours also contains, that provides less authority but proper oversight. In other words, in this case they would not retain the capability of changing a charge after a court martial is found, which they have today as a convening authority. But that would be left to judicial authorities on appeal. I think there are things like that that have been proposed in your bill that is acceptable, in the long run will be helpful to this problem.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Senator Blumenthal?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

If I may follow up again just very briefly. In your career, General, have you acted as a convening authority and decided to prosecute cases of sexual assault?

General SCAPARROTTI. In my time, I believe I have acted as a convening authority in terms of sexual assault. I know that I dealt with this issue as the commander or the commandant at West Point. That is the age group that we have the greatest challenge in in the military, and it happens to be the age group that we have at West Point as cadets. I became very involved in every aspect of this issue.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Did you take a course in the Uniform Code of Military Justice?

General SCAPARROTTI. Yes, sir, I have both in the courses that we go through as part of our career, but I personally made it a point to go to our legal school both before the time I became a battalion level commander and again before I became a brigade level commander and obtained special court martial convening authority. I purposely did that to ensure that my understanding and training was honed.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Using that training, did you decide to prosecute individuals under your command for sexual assault?

General SCAPARROTTI. Yes, I have, sir.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. On how many occasions would you say?

General SCAPARROTTI. I could not give you the number, sir. I know that I dealt with cases at West Point in particular. I would have to go back and review. In I Corps, I probably did, just given the number of cases and the size of the element.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Did you ever decide to prosecute despite a recommendation to the contrary from the judge advocate?

General SCAPARROTTI. No, I never have. I cannot remember an occasion that I have disagreed with my judge advocate.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. So that when you received a recommendation to go forward and prosecute, you did so.

General SCAPARROTTI. That is correct.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. On every occasion?

General SCAPARROTTI. I would like to say one of the initiatives that we have talked about within the Services is the use of judge advocates and those who are specialized in particular crimes. In the case of sexual assault, for instance, I can tell you clearly that I have dealt with it as a convening authority in cases that had to do with murder, and in those cases, I sought not only my judge advocate's opinions, but I also asked that he go to the Army. We had their specialist in that area provide me advice as well. I think that is something that we can do in this area with those specially trained.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. You would like to see prosecutors who are specially trained and experienced with expertise in this area of sexual assault because it is a very challenging and sometimes difficult one not just to decide but also to actually proceed and prosecute and try and convict. Am I correct?

General SCAPARROTTI. That is correct.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Would you also like to see those types of trained and experienced prosecutors involved in the decision to prosecute?

General SCAPARROTTI. I would. As I have said, I sought that kind of help when I was a convening authority.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I very much appreciate your answers to my questions. As you may know, there is another point of view on the convening authority issue, and I personally deeply respect the solution that the chairman and ranking member have helped to lead. It has been great leadership on this issue in seeking a change. But I also think that we need to treat this crime as, in fact, a predatory heinous crime and that someone with the prosecutorial expertise and experience that you have described may be in a better position to make these decisions. I say that with all due respect. I really appreciate your answers to my questions.

General SCAPARROTTI. Thank you, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Just to be very, very clear here, now the alternative proposal is to transfer the decisionmaking as to whether to proceed to a trained and experienced judge advocate or prosecutor. That is not what you support, I gather.

General SCAPARROTTI. That is correct, sir. The Senator said "assist," and I believe the commander should still be in the chain.

Chairman LEVIN. When you say that you would like to consult with such a trained and experienced Judge Advocate General officer and for that person to be involved in that sense to be consulted, that does, I take it from your testimony, in no way diminish your belief that the decisionmaking needs to remain in the chain of command.

General SCAPARROTTI. Mr. Chairman, you are correct.

Chairman LEVIN. Anything else?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much.

We are all done. Thank you both. Thanks to your families. We will stand adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 11:22 a.m., the committee adjourned.]

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and the chain of command by clearly delineating the combatant commanders' responsibilities and authorities and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. These reforms have also improved cooperation between the Services and the combatant commanders, among other things, in joint training and education and in the execution of military operations.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. No. I believe that Goldwater-Nichols as it stands is effective.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. N/A

DUTIES

Question. What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the Commander, U.S. Strategic Command (STRATCOM)?

Answer. The Commander, STRATCOM, is responsible for the plans and operations for U.S. Forces conducting strategic deterrence and the Department of Defense (DOD) space and cyberspace operations. These responsibilities include the following missions: deter attacks on U.S. vital interests, ensure U.S. freedom of action in space and cyberspace, deliver integrated kinetic and non-kinetic effects in support of U.S. Joint Force Commander operations, synchronizing planning and coordinating operations support for global missile defense, synchronize regional combating weapons of mass destruction plans, provide integrated surveillance and reconnaissance allocation recommendations to the Secretary of Defense and advocate for assigned capabilities.

Question. What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform these duties?

Answer. My 35 year career includes assignments and responsibilities involving operational and staff assignments in the U.S. Navy, the Joint Staff, and STRATCOM. I have completed various operational, leadership, and strategic deterrence assignments within the submarine force, to include assistant squadron deputy at Submarine Squadron Eight before taking command of USS Honolulu (SSN 718) and commanded Submarine Squadron One, and Submarine Group Two. I have served as the Deputy Chief of Staff of Plans, Policies and Requirements, U.S. Pacific Fleet (N5N8); and Director, Submarine Warfare Division (N87); Director, Naval Warfare Integration Group (N00X) and Deputy Commander, U.S. Strategic Command.

As the Deputy Commander, STRATCOM, I gained experience in delivering effects with the broad range of strategic capabilities for combatant commanders engaged across the spectrum of conflict around the world. As Commander, Pacific Fleet for the past 3 years, I organized, trained and equipped pacific theater operational naval assets in space, cyberspace, intelligence, missile defense, and strategic effects in support of the missions of U.S. Pacific Command (PACOM), STRATCOM, North American Aerospace Defense Command and other combatant commands. I have also served as Commander, Joint Task Force 519 for Commander, PACOM. If confirmed, I will leverage my experience to lead STRATCOM in fulfilling its responsibilities.

Question. Do you believe that there are any steps that you need to take to enhance your expertise to perform the duties of the Commander, U.S. Strategic Command?

Answer. I will seek to continue to enhance my expertise in STRATCOM's broad range of missions. If confirmed, I look forward to working with all the combatant commanders and the many organizations STRATCOM depends on for continued success, many of whom I worked with during my tour as the Deputy Commander, STRATCOM. I intend to establish clear lines of communication, define relationships and become more familiar with these organizations (e.g. Department of Homeland Security, Department of Energy-National Nuclear Security Administration, Missile Defense Agency, Defense Threat Reduction Agency, and the Nuclear Weapons Council) and their contributions to mission success.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. Section 162(b) of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the chain of command runs from the President to the Secretary of Defense and from the Secretary of Defense to the commanders of the combatant commands. Other sections of law and traditional practice, however, establish important relationships outside the chain of command. Please describe your understanding of the relationship of the Commander, U.S. Strategic Command, to the following officials:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. Pursuant to title 10, U.S.C., section 164, subject to the direction of the President, the Commander, STRATCOM, performs duties under the authority, direction and control of the Secretary of Defense and is directly responsible to the Secretary for the preparedness of the command to carry out assigned missions.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. In accordance with title 10, U.S.C., section 132, the Deputy Secretary of Defense will perform such duties and exercise powers prescribed by the Secretary of Defense. The Deputy Secretary of Defense will act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense when the Secretary is disabled or the office is vacant. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Deputy Secretary on appropriate matters.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.

Answer. The Under Secretary for Policy is the principal staff assistant (PSA) and advisor to the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense for all matters on the formulation of national security and defense policy and the integration and oversight of DOD policy and plans to achieve national security objectives.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence.

Answer. The Under Secretary for Intelligence is the PSA and advisor to the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense for all matters regarding intelligence, counterintelligence, security, sensitive activities and other intelligence-related matters.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics.

Answer. The Under Secretary for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics is the PSA and advisor to the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense for all matters relating to the DOD Acquisition System; research and development; modeling and simulation; systems integration; logistics; installation management; military construction; procurement; environment; services; and nuclear, chemical and biological programs.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Global Strategic Affairs.

Answer. The Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Global Strategic Affairs (ASD/GSA) is a newly configured directorate in the Office of the Secretary of Defense that develops policy for the Secretary on countering weapons of mass destruction, nuclear forces and missile defense, cyber security and space issues. GSA is currently tasked with three major congressionally-mandated reviews: the Nuclear Posture Review, the Ballistic Missile Defense Review, and the Space Posture Review. In addition, GSA is the Defense Department's lead in developing a cyber-security strategy for the Department and for crafting the policy for the standup of the new Cyber Command. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Assistant Secretary of Defense for ASD/GSA in coordination with the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy on matters in the area of U.S. Strategic Command.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Homeland Defense and Americas' Security Affairs.

Answer. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Homeland Defense and Americas' Security Affairs under the authority, direction and control of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, serves as the principal civilian advisor to the Secretary of Defense and the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy on Homeland defense activities, Defense Support of Civil Authorities, Western Hemisphere security matters and provides overall supervision of homeland defense activities of DOD. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Homeland Security and Americas' Security in coordination with the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy on matters in the area of U.S. Strategic Command.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Nuclear, Chemical, and Biological Defense Programs.

Answer. The Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Nuclear, Chemical, and Biological Programs advises the Secretary of Defense on nuclear energy, nuclear weapons and chemical and biological defense; serves as the Staff Director of the Nuclear Weapons Council; and performs such additional duties as the Secretary may prescribe. If confirmed, I will work closely with this office and the Nuclear Weapons Council in support of the nuclear deterrence mission.

Question. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff,

Answer. Title 10, U.S.C., section 163, clearly establishes the Chairman as the principal military advisor to the President, the National Security Council, the Homeland Security Council and the Secretary of Defense. In this role, he is the most senior ranking member of the armed forces but does not exercise command over any military forces or serve in the Chain of Command between the President and Secretary of Defense and combatant commanders, although the President may transmit communications through him. By law and as directed by the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman consults with the combatant commanders, evaluates and assists in achieving their requirements and plans. The Chairman provides a vital link between the combatant commanders and other elements of DOD. If confirmed, I will keep the Chairman and the Secretary of Defense promptly informed on matters for which I am personally accountable as Commander, STRATCOM.

Question. The Secretaries of the Military Departments.

Answer. Under title 10, U.S.C., section 165, subject to the authority, direction and control of the Secretary of Defense, and subject to the authority of the combatant commanders, the Secretaries of the Military Departments are responsible for administration and support of forces that are assigned to unified and specified commands. The authority exercised by a combatant commander over Service components is quite clear but requires close coordination with each Secretary to ensure there is no infringement upon those lawful responsibilities which a Secretary alone may discharge. If confirmed, I look forward to building a strong and productive relationship with each of the Secretaries of the Military Departments.

Question. The Chiefs of Staff of the Services.

Answer. As a result of the Goldwater-Nichols Act, the Service Chiefs no longer serve in the operational chain of command. They now serve to provide organized, trained and equipped forces to be employed by combatant commanders in accomplishing their assigned missions. Additionally, these officers serve as members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and have a lawful obligation to provide military advice. Individually and collectively, the Service Chiefs are a tremendous source of experience and judgment. If confirmed, I will work closely and confer regularly with the Service Chiefs.

Question. The Director of the National Reconnaissance Office.

Answer. The National Reconnaissance Office (NRO) is a DOD organization engaged in the research and development, acquisition, launch and operation of overhead reconnaissance systems necessary to meet the needs of the Intelligence Community and of the DOD. According to the Unified Command Plan, STRATCOM is the responsible combatant command for both space operations and for planning, integrating and coordinating intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance in support of strategic and global operations, as directed. In these capacities, the Commander, STRATCOM must maintain a close relationship with the Director of the NRO to coordinate and represent requirements in these mission areas. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Director of the NRO on matters of shared interest and importance.

Question. The combatant commanders, particularly Commander, U.S. Northern Command, and Air Force Global Strike Command and U.S. Cyber Command.

Answer. The Commander, STRATCOM has both supported and supporting relationships with other combatant commanders, largely identified within the Unified Command Plan (UCP), the Forces for Unified Commands Memorandum, the Joint Strategic Capabilities Plan, specific command arrangement agreements, Operations Plans and Concept Plans. Air Force Global Strike Command is an Air Force major command that provides combat ready forces to STRATCOM to conduct nuclear deterrence and global strike operations as directed. U.S. Cyber Command is a subordinate unified command to STRATCOM. U.S. Cyber Command plans, coordinates, integrates, synchronizes and conducts activities to direct the operations and defense of specified DOD information networks. STRATCOM supports U.S. Northern Command's mission to conduct homeland defense to secure and defend the United States and its interests. In many cases, STRATCOM is a supporting combatant commander for other UCP assigned missions. If confirmed, I look forward to working with other combatant commanders to broaden and enhance the level and range of these relationships.

Question. The Administrator of the National Nuclear Security Administration.

Answer. According to title 50, U.S.C., section 2402, the Department of Energy's Under Secretary for Nuclear Security serves as Administrator of the National Nuclear Security Administration. The Administrator is responsible for all Department of Energy programs and activities related to nuclear weapons, including the stockpile stewardship program. Although the Administrator serves outside the DOD's operational control, he does serve on the Nuclear Weapons Council and executes duties which closely concern and support STRATCOM. If confirmed, I will work closely and confer regularly with the Administrator.

Question. The Director of the Missile Defense Agency.

Answer. The Missile Defense Agency (MDA) serves as the missile defense systems engineering and development organization for DOD. It provides the research, development, testing and evaluation of the missile defense and associated systems that would be employed by combatant commanders. The current Unified Command Plan charges STRATCOM with synchronizing planning for global missile defense including coordinating global missile defense operations support, and developing and advocating for missile defense and warning capabilities. Given these closely aligned responsibilities, both the Commander, STRATCOM, and its Joint Functional Component Command for Integrated Missile Defense must continue their close working relationship with MDA. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Director of MDA to ensure that combatant commanders' required ballistic missile defense and warning capabilities are appropriately and effectively represented to MDA.

Question. The Director of Operational Test and Evaluation.

Answer. Title 10, U.S.C, section 139, provides for a Director of Operational Test and Evaluation, who serves as the principal advisor to the Secretary of Defense and the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics on operational test and evaluation in DOD and the principal operational test and evaluation official within the senior management of DOD. The Director, as allowed by law and departmental regulations, formulates policy, provides guidance, coordinates, reviews, monitors and makes recommendations regarding test and evaluation matters under his purview. If confirmed, I will work closely with and seek the advice of the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation in assessing the progress of command programs of interest.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges that will confront the next Commander, U.S. Strategic Command?

Answer. The missions of STRATCOM are at the heart of U.S. national security and that of our allies and friends abroad. Today's national security environment is far more complex and diverse than ever before. Wider access to advanced technology, newly assertive states with rising aspirations regionally and globally, and still emerging vulnerabilities created by transnational linkages all fuel threats requiring synchronized efforts of many departments and agencies and other countries as well. Ensuring mission readiness and the proper policies, decision authorities and organizational relationships are in place to rapidly respond to complex and diverse threats will be a major challenge.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with other Federal departments, agencies and allied partners to advance the policies and relationships needed to enhance a cooperative and collaborative approach. I will assess the STRATCOM organizational structure and work to streamline processes and enhance flexibility, effectiveness and efficiency.

Question. What are your priorities for the U.S. Strategic Command?

Answer. The first priority is to provide a safe, secure and effective strategic nuclear force providing strategic deterrence for the United States and its allies. STRATCOM has a unique responsibility regarding the country's deterrent force in setting requirements and translating national guidance into operational readiness. Second, ongoing combat operations require many of the capabilities provided by STRATCOM and, if confirmed, I will consult with the Commander, U.S. Central Command and the other combatant commanders to provide capabilities for today's conflict. Third, in line with the new National Space Policy, STRATCOM must preserve U.S. access to space and freedom of action in space by improving awareness and providing resilient capabilities for the joint fight. Fourth, relationships across Federal agencies with cyberspace responsibilities need to be defined to enhance the Nation's cyber security and support to joint operations.

STRATEGIC THREATS

Question. In your view, what are the most serious strategic threats facing the United States today?

Answer. As repeatedly stated by administration leaders, the pursuit of nuclear weapons by violent extremist groups and the proliferation of nuclear weapons technology to additional states are the greatest strategic threats to the United States. Beyond this is the immense challenge of defining strategic relationships to ensure stability involving new and emerging powers. Also, the pace of technology—especially in the realms of space and cyberspace—is so rapid it could outpace our ability to maintain our strategic edge. Finally, we are faced with ever changing traditional and nontraditional threats that pose serious consequences to U.S. global interests. Some of these threats—such as anti-access/area denial weapons and strategies—are understood and the United States is addressing them, others are not as well understood or acknowledged and will take time to address.

Question. What future strategic threats should the United States prepare for?

Answer. Our potential adversaries have studied the U.S. way of warfare and are actively developing asymmetric responses. We will need flexible and adaptive capabilities to respond to these unknown abilities.

U.S. STRATEGIC COMMAND MISSIONS

Question. In an overarching sense, how do you define the U.S. Strategic Command mission?

Answer. STRATCOM promotes global security for the United States and its interests through strategic deterrence, ensuring U.S. freedom of action in space and cyberspace and through dedicated planning, advocacy and operational execution efforts to advance our warfighting priorities.

Question. U.S. Strategic Command has absorbed multiple new missions since its creation, with the most recent addition being the establishment of the Cyber Command, as a sub-unified command of the Strategic Command.

How successful has U.S. Strategic Command been at integrating these new missions and acquiring the expertise needed to perform them?

Answer. My sense is that STRATCOM is on track with integrating mature missions, like space, while emerging missions, like cyberspace and missile defense, continue to advance. There is still more to be done among all the Services, and recruiting, training and retaining the personnel with the right expertise is very important. If confirmed, I will move quickly to assess the scope of all mission areas, integration and expertise, and take appropriate action as needed.

Question. What organizational challenges remain at U.S. Strategic Command related to these new missions? Specifically, what additional work, if any, remains to be done and what expertise, if any, needs to be acquired for these new missions?

Answer. Cyberspace capabilities and capacity are still maturing across DOD and the national security enterprise. If confirmed, I will assess the status of capabilities and determine the proper course of action to align personnel and resources to address the issues.

Question. If confirmed, would you recommend or support any changes in the missions currently assigned to U.S. Strategic Command? If so, what changes would you recommend?

Answer. Not at this time. As my understanding of the missions evolved and integration matured, I would assess command mission effectiveness and recommend changes as appropriate.

Question. Are you aware of any additional new missions that are being contemplated for the Strategic Command?

Answer. No. I am not aware of any new missions being considered for Strategic Command.

ORGANIZATION

Question. In addition to the Cyber-Command, the Command is organized into a series of joint functional component commands that correspond to the mission areas of the Strategic Command.

If confirmed, would you anticipate maintaining or modifying this structure?

Answer. I would not anticipate any immediate changes; however, as relationships across Federal agencies are defined and cyberspace capabilities are matured, there may be a need to make organizational changes. It is important to keep a flexible organizational structure that is capable of responding to a constantly changing threat environment and technology advances.

BALLISTIC MISSILE DEFENSE

Question. How do you view the roles and responsibilities of the Commander, U.S. Strategic Command, related to ballistic missile defense?

Answer. The UCP charges STRATCOM with responsibilities for synchronizing planning for global missile defense, including coordinating global missile defense operations support and developing and advocating for missile defense characteristics and capabilities desired by combatant commanders. If confirmed, I will ensure STRATCOM and its Joint Functional Component Command for Integrated Missile Defense (JFCC–IMD) continue their close working relationship with MDA, the geographic combatant commanders, and Services to integrate capabilities across combatant command boundaries and to serve as the Joint Functional Manager for global force management of BMD forces.

Question. What do you believe is the appropriate function of the Joint Functional Component Command for Integrated Missile Defense?

Answer. JFCC–IMD's mission is to synchronize missile defense planning, conduct BMD operations support, and advocate for missile defense capabilities, in support of STRATCOM, other combatant commands, the Services, and appropriate U.S. Government agencies, to deter and defend the United States, deployed forces, and its allies against ballistic missile attacks. In addition, JFCC–IMD serves as the MDA counterpart to represent warfighter equities in the BMD development and integrates BMD test, training, and exercise activities. If confirmed, I look forward to reviewing the current activities of JFCC–IMD to ensure that this is the most appropriate function for today's national security environment.

Question. If confirmed, would you recommend or support any changes in the authorities of Commander, U.S. Strategic Command, as they relate to ballistic missile defense?

Answer. As of today, I would not make any changes. If confirmed, I will continue the close working relationships with the combatant commanders and the Missile Defense Agency and make recommendations to the Secretary of Defense regarding the appropriate authorities to support the defense of the United States and its allies.

Question. If confirmed, what role would you anticipate playing in the assessment of the military utility of U.S. ballistic missile defenses against short-, medium-, intermediate-, and long-range ballistic missiles?

Answer. In response to UCP 05 and DODD 5134.09 guidance, STRATCOM conducted and reported a Military Utility Assessment of the Ballistic Missile Defense System (BMDS) from 2006 to 2010. The intent of the MUA is to conduct assess the utility of the delivered capability—which is being replaced by the Operational Readiness & Acceptance (OR&A) process to formalize the acceptance of the delivered capability based on their operational utility. We are now working on the Global IAMD Assessment as a companion document to the OR&A to define operational risks associated with BMD operations.

Question. If confirmed, what role would you anticipate playing in representing and advocating for the views and needs of the combatant commanders for missile defense capabilities, and how do you believe that warfighter perspective should inform our missile defense program?

Answer. The Ballistic Missile Defense (BMD) Program exists to meet the limited defense of the United States and the theater defense needs of combatant commanders. STRATCOM sponsors the missile defense Warfighter Involvement Process to capture and articulate warfighter capability needs to inform the BMD program development. STRATCOM also manages the development of the Global Integrated Air and Missile Defense Assessment to articulate combatant commanders' operational risks that must be remedied in the BMD development. If confirmed, I will consult fellow combatant commanders and advocate for their mission needs, always mindful of the joint warfighter.

Question. Please describe your view of the appropriate roles for the Joint Staff and the Missile Defense Executive Board in guiding decisions on the development, acquisition, and deployment of effective missile defense capabilities.

Answer. The Joint Staff is responsible for defining required systems interoperability and operational architectures while validating joint theater missile defense capabilities through both simulation and technology demonstrations. The role of the Missile Defense Executive Board is to provide oversight and guidance in a collaborative mode involving all missile defense stakeholders in DOD and other agencies and departments. Important considerations for both entities include the necessary transition of tested systems from MDA to a military Service to be organized, trained, and equipped for eventual combatant command employment.

Question. Do you agree that any ballisic missile defense systems that are deployed must be operationally effective and cost-effective?

Answer. Yes. The joint warfighter requires fielded systems with military utility. I agree with the Secretary of Defense Ballistic Missile Defense Report which established metrics to measure ballistic missile defense systems cost effectiveness through comparison with available options, affordability, and comparison of incurred vice avoided costs.

Question. Do you agree that ballistic missile defense flight tests need to be operationally realistic, and that operational testing is necessary, in order to demonstrate the capabilities of our systems and provide confidence that they will work effectively?

Answer. I agree with the Missile Defense Agency testing approach outlined in the Integrated Master Test Plan that the tests will be conducted as operationally realistically as possible, exercising Warfighter Tactics, Techniques, and Procedures against operationally realistic threats. If confirmed, I will support this approach and assess the capabilities of ballistic missile defense systems.

Question. What are your views on the relationship between ballistic missile defenses and nuclear deterrence?

Answer. Ballistic missile defenses protect the United States against the threat of a limited intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) attack by a regional actor such as North Korea or Iran. Through deployment of limited defenses, the United States seeks to dissuade such states from developing an ICBM, deter them from using an ICBM if they develop or acquire such a capability, and defeat an ICBM attack by such states should deterrence fail denying them the benefits of possessing or using such systems. Ballistic missile defenses will also defend U.S. deployed forces from regional missile threats while also protecting our allies and partners and enabling them to defend themselves. Present plans for missile defense do not contemplate protection of the United States against large scale nuclear strikes. The U.S. strategic nuclear deterrent force of ICBMs, bombers and ballistic missile submarines will remain the primary deterrent of nuclear attacks against the United States, our allies, and partners.

Question. Do you support the policies and priorities stated in the Ballistic Missile Defense Review report of February 2010?

Answer. I support the current Ballistic Missile Defense policies and priorities.

Question. Do you support the homeland ballistic missile defense initiatives announced by Secretary Hagel on March 15, 2013, including the planned deployment of 14 additional Ground-Based Interceptors (GBIs) in Alaska?

Answer. Yes. I support all initiatives. Of note, the additional 14 GBIs in Alaska will add capacity to U.S. Homeland defense against new and evolving adversary ICBM capabilities. Another important initiative is the deployment of an additional

AN/TPY–2 radar into the PACOM area of operations which will also improve our capabilities to defend the United States while also enhancing regional BMD.

Question. Do you support proceeding with the Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) process required by section 227 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 to inform future decisions about deployment of a possible additional homeland ballistic missile defense site in the United States, in case the President determines to proceed with such an additional deployment?

Answer. Yes. With the restructuring of the SM–3 Block IIB program, continuing to explore the possibility of another CONUS interceptor site is a prudent measure. The completion of the EIS will reduce the timeline to implement this option should such a decision be made.

Question. Do you agree with the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff that additional analysis is needed, including analysis of the missile threat from Iran, before making a decision on whether to deploy such an additional missile defense site in the future?

Answer. Yes. We will need to carefully consider the threat to clearly understand the potential operational benefits that can be realized for the associated costs of enacting such an option. While an additional missile defense site provides operational utility, the cost should also be carefully considered, as well as the warfighter's priority to improve the sensor capability.

Question. Do you believe that it may be possible to assess the advisability and feasibility of deploying an additional homeland ballistic missile defense site before the EIS is completed?

Answer. I believe that the Department of Defense can conduct preliminary assessments in advance of an EIS. STRATCOM and U.S. Northern Command are assisting the Missile Defense Agency with such preliminary assessments in compliance with National Defense Authorization Act direction. We would be more confident in the assessments with an EIS completed.

Question. Do you agree with the Director of the Missile Defense Agency and the Commander of the Joint Functional Component Command for Integrated Missile Defense on the importance of enhancing our missile defense sensor capabilities to improve discrimination and kill assessment for homeland ballistic missile defense?

Answer. Yes. I agree.

Question. Do you agree there is no significant funding in the fiscal year 2014 Presidential Budget request for the foregoing activities?

Answer. There is substantial funding in Missile Defense Agency's fiscal year 2014 budget request to continue to research, develop and improve sensor and discrimination capabilities, however I agree there is no significant funding contained in the budget to acquire any additional sensors. Additionally, a study has been initiated to determine how best to support future sensor requirements and Missile Defense Agency is exploring technologies to improve the capabilities of ground, air, and space sensors.

Question. Do you support the Phased Adaptive Approach to missile defense in Europe (EPAA), and do you believe this approach will provide a timely and effective capability to address existing and emerging Iranian ballistic missile threats to Europe?

Answer. Yes. The work is ongoing and, if confirmed, I will continue to assess our progress and make recommendations to the Secretary of Defense.

Question. What capability was lost with the decision to cancel Phase IV of the EPAA, and how does it compare to the capability of deploying 14 additional GBIs in Alaska by 2017?

Answer. The cancellation of EPAA Phase IV resulted in the potential loss of early engagement opportunities (i.e. Defense in Depth) for Iranian ICBM threats to the United States. Deploying an additional 14 GBIs to Alaska will add capacity to U.S. Homeland defense.

Question. What role do you believe Strategic Command should play in the development and implementation of the Phased Adaptive Approach to missile defense in Europe and other regions?

Answer. STRATCOM's role is to synchronize global missile defense plans, coordinate global missile defense operations support, and through the JFCC IMD, act as the Joint Functional Manager for global force management of missile defense capabilities.

Question. Do you believe it is in our interest to cooperate with Russia on ballistic missile defense, including the possibility of sharing radar early warning data?

Answer. Yes. To quote the BMDR, "The United States will also continue in its efforts to establish a cooperative BMD relationship with Russia. . . . The administration is committed to substantive and sustained dialogue with the leadership of Russia on U.S. missile defenses and their roles in different regions. . . . Our goals are to enlist Russia in an new structure of deterrence that addresses the emerging challenges to international peace and security posed by a small number of states seeking illicit capabilities."

What do you believe are the most promising opportunities to work collaboratively with Russia to address emerging ballistic missile threats?

Answer. As agreed by President Obama and President Medvedev at the July 2009 Moscow Summit, the most promising opportunity to work with Russia is in the joint assessment of the ballistic missile threat. If the Russians are willing, open and transparent bilateral or multilateral wargames or exercises, and sharing of early warning information are also options that may lead to a better relationship with Russia.

CYBER SECURITY

Question. What are your priorities for the U.S. Cyber Command?

Answer. Our reliance on cyber capabilities, the many and varied threats, and the rapid rate of technological change all demand we place an initial and enduring focus on defense of our information networks. Priorities beyond defense include assuring the warfighting mission, strengthening and expanding partnerships in the domain, building capacity and capability to conduct full-spectrum cyberspace operations and developing processes to integrate cyberspace capabilities into combatant command plans operations and across DOD.

Question. In your view, what are the most important unmet priorities for the development and deployment of cyber security tools and capabilities?

Answer. U.S. Strategic Command, as a global combatant command, is in a unique position to favorably influence two essential priorities in this area. The first is to advance the development of a multi-Service cadre of cyber professionals, with emphasis on technical and tactical competence. This includes continuous training and education and focused career path development. The second is to accelerate the fielding of shared cyber situational awareness tools, taking advantage of emerging technologies to know friendly and threat activity within the network while understanding intent; and display and disseminate that information in an operationally relevant manner.

Question. If confirmed, what role will you play in establishing policy for U.S. Cyber Command?

Answer. If confirmed, I will exercise combatant command over U.S. Cyber Command, engage and advise senior leaders within the Department of Defense, Federal agencies, and with Members of Congress to advocate for the appropriate policies regarding cyberspace operations.

Question. What are your views on the issue of elevating U.S. Cyber Command to a full unified command, including the timetable for elevating the Command?

Answer. I believe the current command relationship is working. However, if a decision is made to make U.S. Cyber Command a unified command, we should not break the current dual-hatted relationship between the National Security Agency and U.S. Cyber Command. This relationship is central to mission success.

SPACE

Question. What is your view on the responsiveness of current space systems to meet warfighter needs and what are the opportunities for the Operationally Response Space program to meet military and other space requirements?

Answer. National Security Space systems are responsive to warfighters' needs. As the speed of warfare increases and military decision cycles decrease, space systems need to continue to evolve in their ability to deliver capability sooner. The increasingly congested, contested, and competitive nature of space will require continual improvements in the responsiveness and resilience of our space infrastructure. The Operationally Responsive Space initiative is one tool at our disposal to meet urgent combatant command needs or leverage developed technology to meet anticipated warfighter needs.

Question. What is your view of the ability of DOD to develop and deploy space systems in a cost-effective and timely manner?

Answer. DOD has worked extensively to reverse troubling acquisition trends. Significant strides are being made with a concentration on program stability, increasing the quantity and quality of the acquisition workforce and strengthening the requirements process to allow for incremental system development and increased technology maturation. Architectural work to conceptualize the space enterprise of the future is increasingly considering factors such as resilience, affordability, and responsiveness in addition to the historical emphasis on performance and reliability.

This groundwork should significantly improve our ability to field future space capabilities that are both cost-effective and timely.

Question. What steps, if any, do you believe might be necessary to improve the responsiveness of current space systems?

Answer. Responsiveness, as measured by the speed, capacity and fusion of data to the warfighter, are important in the evolution of warfare to counter adaptive adversaries. Providing the warfighter with dynamic situational awareness, such as for tailored Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance, while optimizing stressed communications and networks, will increase the value of current space systems. Lowering the cost of space systems and launch systems is a key element for improving responsiveness. Low cost space solutions permit us to move rapidly, practice risk-management vs risk-avoidance, and consequently have the ability to respond to immediate needs.

Question. In your view, what are the most important unmet requirements for space systems?

Answer. Guaranteeing mission assurance, which includes resilience and space protection, is critical. Central to this is developing adequate Space Situational Awareness in a domain that is increasingly competitive, congested and contested. Geographic combatant commanders require a sustained emphasis on meeting Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance needs and satisfying increased military satellite communication requirements in support of global military operations.

Question. Do you believe any urgent needs or capability gaps exist? If so, please specify in detail.

Answer. Urgent needs and capability gaps will continue to exist in a constantly changing battlespace and a fiscally constrained environment. Persistent ISR and increasing satellite communications bandwidth are continuing needs identified by the regional combatant commands. If confirmed, I will work through the Joint Staff and Service components to mitigate capability gaps and respond to combatant commanders' urgent needs.

Question. What do you believe should be done to meet those requirements, and what space programs should be accorded highest priority?

Answer. If confirmed, I will articulate national and joint warfighter imperatives, including a judicious blend of alliances, partnerships and commercial relationships. I will also press for improved space situational awareness and ensure the highest priority is accorded to meeting continuing needs for assured communications, uninterrupted missile warning, persistent positioning, navigation, and timing and overhead Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance (ISR). Additionally, I will advocate through the Services for greater investments in scientific and technical advancement to maintain our space systems advantages well into the future.

Question. How important, in your view, is persistent surveillance, and what programs do you believe are best able to provide this capability?

Answer. Combatant commanders identify persistent surveillance as an enduring priority needed to detect, collect, disseminate, and characterize activity in the battlespace. Space, airborne, maritime, and terrestrial programs contribute to ISR, but where persistent surveillance can be achieved is through integration of sensors on multiple platforms, with space-based ISR providing unique contributions over deep and denied areas.

Question. What is your view on the effectiveness of efforts to cooperate with the commercial space sector to improve space situational awareness and how could this effort be expanded and made more successful?

Answer. The Space Situational Awareness (SSA) Sharing Program at U.S. Strategic Command has been the lynchpin of international engagements with spacefaring nations and industry. In 2012, STRATCOM provided 10,000 satellite conjunction warnings. This high fidelity information was instrumental in ensuring spaceflight safety for over one thousand active satellites orbiting the Earth. Today, STRATCOM supplies SSA information through SSA Sharing Agreements with 38 commercial firms. This year, STRATCOM negotiated and concluded the first international SSA Sharing Agreements with Japan and Australia. These agreements are the first in what will be a series of international SSA Sharing Agreements with our partners and allies

These ongoing endeavors result in improved data-exchange between U.S. Strategic Command, the commercial sector and space faring nations and, as such, reduces the risk of collisions in space leading to a safer space environment.

Question. What are your views on disaggregation of space sensors systems and has your experience with SBIRS HEO–1 and HEO–2 affected that?

Answer. Disaggregation of space systems should consider cost, schedule, performance and resiliency across a range of threat environments. We need to do a better job of leveraging the inherent resiliency embedded within our current systems. The Department is beginning early analysis to understand the strengths, weaknesses, opportunities, and threats of disaggregated architectures which will provide a basis for investment decisions.

Question. In the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2004, Congress approved a national policy to support two space launch vehicles, or families of launch vehicles, capable of launching national security payloads into space. The two launch vehicles have been combined into one company to provide launch services to the U.S. Government with the expectation that this would improve both the efficiency of space launch and reduce the cost.

What are your expectations with respect to future space launch efficiencies and cost savings?

Answer. Low cost launch is an important enabler for an entire emerging class of space capabilities. In the experimental/demonstration realm (programs typically executed by the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, Air Force Research Laboratory, Naval Research Laboratory, or Space and Missile Defense Command) low cost launch provides access to space for S&T missions requiring very tight budgets. These missions demonstrate key technologies or concepts of operations that lead to more effective operational capabilities in the future. In the operational realm, low-cost launch enables one-off responsive space systems (e.g. ORS–1 satellite providing ISR for U.S. Central Command), emerging operational cubesats/nanosats, and perhaps even some alternate space architectures currently under consideration.

Question. In the next several years the rate of space launches is expected to increase, what new approaches to space launch, in your view, should be implemented to handle this increased rate of launch?

Answer. Recent Service-led improvements in the range manifest and scheduling process, such as the concept of matching boosters with satellites when there is a higher confidence of being ready for launch, will maximize the probability of meeting launch demands consistent with national priorities.

Question. What, in your view, should the United States do in the future, and what steps would you take if confirmed, to ensure continued reliable access to space?

Answer. I will continue to advocate for cooperative development of launch and range transformation initiatives by and between the Services, NRO, and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA).

Question. Do you believe that the Nation should sustain redundant space launch capabilities?

Answer. Robust access to space is a national imperative requiring flexible capability to ensure continuity of access. Additional service and commercial capabilities are emerging. If confirmed, I will continue to review the viability of these approaches and advocate appropriately assuring the Nation's access to space.

Question. What do you see as the greatest problem implementing a new entrant strategy?

Answer. I am confident the Air Force, NRO, and NASA will support their Launch System Certification agreement with new launch entrants. The certification process will ensure all launch providers and all proposed launch vehicle configurations meet rigorous standards of demonstrated flight reliability, process controls, design margins, and mission assurance in order to receive non-recurring certification.

Question. Recent decisions, and probably future decisions, about launch capabilities made by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration will impact national security space launch cost and capacity.

What, in your view, should the Strategic Command do to coordinate civil and national security space launch?

Answer. Assured access to space is a national imperative that, in a fiscally constrained environment, could benefit from a whole-of-government approach. Strategic Command should continue its participation in the development of a national space transportation policy.

Question. In your view, what are the most significant challenges that the United States faces in military and national security space programs and policy?

Answer. Our challenges are rooted in the increasingly congested, contested and competitive nature of the space domain. If confirmed, I'll continue to address the following top challenges: (1) threats to U.S space capabilities; (2) threats from adversary space capabilities to U.S. military forces; and (3) maintaining our national security space programs in a difficult budget environment.

Question. Training of U.S. military personnel to understand and to incorporate space assets into all aspects of operations is critically important to future military success.

While much has been done to incorporate space assets into all aspects of military operations, in your view are there additional steps that should be taken to address this challenge?

Answer. The availability of space capabilities to Joint Force Commanders is essential towards the United States' ability to win our Nation's conflicts. We are now faced with an era of fiscal uncertainty that causes us to reevaluate how we incorporate space assets into the fight. As we look to partner with our allies and leverage their capabilities through combined space operations, we must reassess our disclosure policies to ensure each side has the ability to capitalize on the partnership.

Question. What role does the National Security Space Institute play in the training process, and how could their training programs be improved?

Answer. Since its establishment in 2004, the National Security Space Institute (NSSI) has been an important part of the Space Professional Development Program and the advancement of space expertise across the Department of Defense. In 2012, STRATCOM conducted a Joint Space Individual Training and Education Needs Assessment to analyze joint space training and education requirements of personnel performing joint space missions. This assessment identified some areas where there are shortfalls in the current space training and education programs. Recommended solutions incorporate both joint and service authorities, personnel systems, and education and training refinements. I anticipate the NSSI will be one of the key organizations responsible for implementing the training and education recommendations to meet space professional needs across the Department of Defense.

Question. What, in your view, are the priorities for improving space situational awareness?

Answer. To improve space situational awareness, we should accomplish the following. First, the United States must have the ability to quickly characterize events (natural and manmade) that threaten our space assets. Second, we must ensure we have improved capabilities to detect, track, and identify space objects. Finally, we must invest in capabilities and partnerships that increase our resilience while also maintaining our leadership.

Question. What programs and policies, in your view, should be changed or added to ensure adequate space situational awareness?

Answer. The legacy space surveillance network is nearing its maximum capacity to detect, track, and identify space objects. We must invest in new capabilities that meet the needs of today's contested and congested space environment. Furthermore, recognizing the utility in incorporating other non-U.S. systems, we must establish partnerships which allow access to space surveillance data. Finally, the systems responsible for processing this data are in dire need of modernization. Capabilities such as the Space Fence and the Joint Space Operations Center Mission System will help the United States meet tomorrow's challenges.

Question. What are your views on how military and national security space should and could be better integrated?

Answer. Significant synergy exists in those common, underlying "enablers" such as the space industrial base, research and development, science and technology and the space workforce. My understanding is that we have made significant progress in integrating these enablers to include the Intelligence Community with the standup of the Space Security and Defense Program. If confirmed, I will continue advocating along these lines to best meet the needs of the Nation.

Question. In your view, what role should the National Security Space Office play in integrating military and national security space?

Answer. I understand that over the past 2 years, there has been a reorganization of the management and coordination of the national security space enterprise, including the establishment of the Defense Space Council, and the re-validation of the Secretary of the Air Force as the Executive Agent for Space. This reorganization has had a positive impact on government-wide coordination of space activities.

If confirmed, I will continue to foster close working relationships amongst fellow members of the Defense Space Council to facilitate unity of effort across the space enterprise.

Question. In your view, should the role of the National Security Space Office be modified or expanded in any way?

Answer. I understand that over the past 2 years, there has been a reorganization of the management and coordination of the national security space enterprise, including the establishment of the Defense Space Council, and the revalidation of the Secretary of the Air Force as the Executive Agent for Space. This reorganization has had a positive impact on government-wide coordination of space activities.

If confirmed, I will continue to foster close working relationships amongst fellow members of the Defense Space Council to facilitate unity of effort across the space enterprise.

Question. What do you see as the greatest challenges in the area of counter space?

Answer. The greatest challenge is maintaining comprehensive real-time/near-real-time space situational awareness (SSA) to assure the earliest possible detection of a threat and enable accurate attribution of actions against our space assets. Successfully meeting this challenge will enable us to take timely and effective actions to protect our assets and clearly identify the source of the threat to allow an appropriate whole-of-government response to those responsible.

Question. In your view, how serious is the vulnerability of our Nation and deployed military forces to the cruise missile threat?

Answer. Cruise missiles represent a credible threat to our Nation and forces abroad.

Question. What role do you believe U.S. Strategic Command should play in the cruise missile defense of our Nation and our deployed military forces?

Answer. STRATCOM is responsible for synchronizing planning for global missile defense to include coordinating global missile defense operations support and advocating for missile defense capabilities. Additionally, as the Air and Missile Defense Integrating Authority, STRATCOM should continue advocating for cruise missile defense capabilities desired by the warfighters.

PROMPT GLOBAL STRIKE

Question. In your view, how adequate are current efforts to establish requirements and develop a prompt global strike capability?

Answer. Current efforts are sufficient. The Joint Requirements Oversight Council (JROC) recently revalidated the prompt strike initial capabilities document and requirements. The Department continues to make progress through investments in the development and testing of prompt strike capabilities.

Question. Do you believe that adequate analysis is being conducted to determine whether a prompt global strike capability should be launched from air, land, maritime surface or subsurface platforms, or a combination thereof?

Answer. Yes. the Air Force completed a comprehensive Analysis of Alternatives (AOA) that considered a range of prompt strike deployment options. In addition, the JROC recently directed a review of technology, operational concepts, and costs as part of an independent review or AOA update. Current development efforts are aimed at technology solutions that could be fielded in a range of operational concepts.

NUCLEAR DETERRENCE

Question. If confirmed as Commander of the U.S. Strategic Command, you would be involved in implementing the new Nuclear Posture Review and the reductions under the New START treaty.

Do you support the New START treaty?

Answer. Yes. New START provides the United States with insight into Russian strategic nuclear forces. The treaty has a verification regime that is effective, robust, enhances transparency, and builds confidence with Russia.

Question. Do you support the recent revision to our nuclear employment strategy?

Answer. Yes. the objectives support deterrence of adversaries and assurance of our allies and partners.

Question. Do you believe we need a fleet of 12 ballistic submarines to replace the Ohio-class submarines?

Answer. Yes. based on current and future projected strategic environments, 12 SSBNs is the minimum required to meet deterrence mission requirements.

Question. What in your view are the most pressing modernization requirements for the Minuteman III ICBM, following completion of the current upgrades?

Answer. The Air Force is conducting sustainment programs to take the Minuteman III ICBM through 2030 as directed by Congress. I will advocate for sustaining planned life extension programs, including arming, firing and fuzing upgrades, guidance modernization, and support equipment replacements.

Question. Do you support the development and fielding of a follow-on program to the Minuteman III ICBM? If so, when will a decision be necessary for pursuing the development of a follow on ICBM?

Answer. Yes. land-based ICBMs are an integral and enduring part of the nuclear triad, and the Air Force is scheduled to begin an AOA this year. Following completion of the AOA, we will work closely with the Air Force to develop a resource strategy to recapitalize our ICBM force beyond 2030.

Question. Do you support and intend to advocate for the modernization of all legs of the triad of nuclear delivery vehicles?

Answer. Yes. modernization of all legs of the triad is essential given our aging systems. The triad's complementary capabilities encourage restraint, deny benefits and, if deterrence fails, impose costs on adversaries. The triad also provides the United States resiliency and flexibility in the event of technical or geopolitical surprise.

Question. In your view, is there a relationship between U.S. nuclear deterrence policy and nonproliferation policy? If so, please describe the relationship.

Answer. Yes. there is a relationship. By extending our deterrent to other nations we provide them an alternative to developing their own nuclear capabilities to meet their security needs. Thus, our extended deterrent contributes to meeting our nonproliferation policy goals.

Question. What are your views on nuclear command and control?

Answer. Today's Nuclear Command and Control systems underpin strategic deterrence and they provide an assured capability for the President to execute nuclear forces under any scenario. Current portions of our architecture are largely a product of the Cold War resulting in some obsolescent and aging elements to the infrastructure, including some elements that are passing their end of life. Despite the growing age of the infrastructure, we are fully capable in executing our nuclear mission. However, to ensure this capability remains viable in the future, continued investment and modernization of the Nuclear Command, Control, and Communications (NC3) architecture is necessary. Current emphasis is required on space-based detection, conferencing, and force direction.

Question. How will you advocate modernizing our nuclear command and control and what aspects in particular in light of the new nuclear employment strategy?

Answer. Today's NC3 systems provide assured and resilient capabilities for the President to execute nuclear forces under any scenario through all phases of conflict. To ensure this capability remains viable in the future, continued investment and modernization of the NC3 architecture is necessary. Current emphasis is required on space-based detection, conferencing, and force direction.

Continued investment for NC3 capabilities, a robust net-centric C2 infrastructure, and insertion of new technologies (such as Internet Protocol-based solutions) will maintain senior leaders' ability to respond deliberately and appropriately to any situation.

We have set a course to modernize NC3 systems to enable secure, enduring, and continuous communications with respect to the current threat environment, as well as emerging threats we are likely to confront (where man-made or natural).

Question. What is your view of the significance of non-strategic nuclear weapons in the nuclear balance between the United States and Russia?

Answer. I believe it is important to consider both strategic and non-strategic weapons and their associated infrastructure when examining questions of nuclear balance between the United States and Russia. Further, we must consider the geostrategic environment in which each country exists to better understand their force composition decisions and thus the implications for force balance.

Question. Do you believe the U.S. Government understands today how to verify reductions in nonstrategic nuclear weapons?

Answer. It depends on the nature of what is to be verified. The U.S. Government was able to verify the eliminations of non-strategic platforms made under the INF Treaty. Procedures to verify warhead eliminations, which have not yet been part of treaty, may require further study.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS COUNCIL

Question. If confirmed you would become a member of the Nuclear Weapons Council.

What would your priorities be for the Nuclear Weapons Council (NWC)?

Answer. My top priority is to continue to sustain and modernize the nuclear enterprise, including weapons, platforms and infrastructure. I support the NWC recently approved strategy and implementation plan for stockpile management and supporting elements.

Question. What changes if any would you recommend to the organization, structure, or function of the NWC?

Answer. None at this time. The NWC is composed of the appropriate members and assigned responsibilities to provide effective oversight of the nuclear weapons enterprise.

Question. What role is the NWC playing or should it play in the discussion with respect to any future nuclear arms control treaties?

Answer. NWC principals provide policy, military, and technical recommendations.

MAINTAINING A SAFE, SECURE AND RELIABLE STOCKPILE

Question. If confirmed you would play a major role, in conjunction with the National Nuclear Security Administration, to maintain the safety, security, and reliability of the U.S stockpile of nuclear weapons.

What are your priorities for implementing that responsibility?

Answer. My top priority is to ensure the stockpile remains safe, secure, and effective to support the Nation's deterrence missions. My priorities include providing an annual assessment of the stockpile's military effectiveness, establishing stockpile requirements and providing military advice on strategy and implementation plans for life extension programs and the nuclear industrial complex.

Question. The Strategic Command is an integral part of the annual certification process for nuclear weapons.

Would you recommend any changes in the Strategic Command's role in the annual process or the process generally?

Answer. Not at this time. I will closely monitor this process and will recommend appropriate changes, if necessary.

STOCKPILE STEWARDSHIP PROGRAM

Question. What is your view of how well the Stockpile Stewardship Program is proceeding towards its goal of being able to continuously assess and annually certify the U.S. enduring nuclear weapons stockpile as safe, secure, and reliable, without the need for underground nuclear testing?

Answer. The Stockpile Stewardship Program is meeting its goal of effectively and continuously assessing the nuclear weapon stockpile. It provides sufficient data and analysis to allow the annual certification of the stockpile without underground nuclear testing.

Question. In your opinion, what are the biggest challenges for the Stockpile Stewardship Program?

Answer. The Stockpile Stewardship Program's most significant challenge is sufficient and stable funding to ensure understanding of the stockpile as it ages, confidence in that understanding in the absence of underground nuclear testing, and timely responsiveness to technical issues that arise.

Question. Do you believe that all nuclear weapon life extension methods, refurbishment, reuse, and replacement, should be given equal consideration?

Answer. I support considering the full range of options as directed in the Nuclear Posture Review. Strong preference will be given to options for refurbishment or reuse. Replacement of nuclear components would be undertaken only if critical Stockpile Management Program goals could not otherwise be met, and if specifically authorized by the President and approved by Congress.

Question. The administration is proposing overhauls of the B–61 gravity bomb, and an interoperable warhead to provide for hedging between different legs of the triad.

What are your greatest concerns with the B–61 life extension program?

Answer. My greatest concern is the weapon remains safe, secure, and effective and capable of meeting its strategic and extended deterrence commitments. The current life extension program addresses the timely replacement of aging components. It is imperative that the program remains adequately funded and on schedule.

Question. The National Nuclear Security Administration estimates the cost of the first version of the interoperable warhead will exceed $14 billion.

Do you support evaluation of straight life extensions of the W–78 and W–88 warheads if either the cost or technical issues with the interoperable warhead become too great?

Answer. I support studying the technical feasibility and cost of an interoperable nuclear explosive package for the W78/88–1. Further, I believe that the W78–1 and W88–1 warhead options should be examined for comparative purposes, so an informed recommendation can be brought to the NWC.

MILITARY-TO-MILITARY COOPERATION PROGRAMS

Question. The U.S. Strategic Command has a long history of conducting military-to-military exchanges and discussions with its counterparts in Russia, but in recent years these exchanges and discussion have stopped for the most part.

If confirmed, would you seek to continue or expand this dialogue?

Answer. If confirmed, I would consult extensively with the Secretary of Defense, the State Department and the Commander, U.S. European Command to see what steps would be appropriate to engage Russia.

Question. Would you seek to establish military-to-military programs to include other countries, such as China?

Answer. If confirmed, I would consult extensively with the Secretary of Defense, the State Department and the Commander, U.S. Pacific Command to see what steps would be appropriate to engage China.

STRATEGIC FORCES AND MISSIONS

Question. During the Cold War, the primary mission for strategic forces was to deter the Soviet Union from using its nuclear weapons and, more broadly, to contribute to U.S. efforts to contain the Soviet Union. Strategic forces were therefore synonymous with nuclear forces. This isn't the case today, as the wide-ranging missions assigned to U.S. Strategic Command make clear.

What, in your view, is the primary mission for U.S. Strategic Forces today and in the future?

Answer. Our strategic forces include our Global Strike (nuclear and conventional), space, cyber, global intelligence, surveillance, reconnaissance and ballistic missile defense capabilities. Their primary missions are to assure allies and partners, deter potential adversaries and if necessary, defend against and defeat adversary attacks on the United States, our allies, and partners.

Question. With the decline in numbers of U.S. and Russian strategic nuclear weapons, is it now more important to take into account non-strategic nuclear weapons?

Answer. Yes. Nuclear weapons regardless of their delivery method are important to consider.

Question. Should we think differently about the use of strategic forces today?

Answer. Yes. Strategic forces today are no longer just nuclear forces. They include our Global Strike (nuclear and conventional), space, cyber, global intelligence, surveillance, reconnaissance and ballistic missile defense capabilities. Thus our thinking about their use must be different.

Question. Given the mission for strategic forces, as you define it, what capabilities are still needed to carry out that mission?

Answer. Required strategic deterrence capabilities include warning, attribution, assured command and control, forces, weapons, and the infrastructure to sustain them. The Triad is the cornerstone of deterrence and strategic stability. Sustainment and recapitalization of strategic nuclear forces and stockpile, space, cyber, National Command and Control systems, and infrastructure are required to deter adversaries, assure allies and partners, and manage risk.

Question. The nuclear weapons in Europe are under the command of the Commander of European Command.

How would you plan to work with that command with respect to nuclear weapons security, and policy?

Answer. If confirmed, I will consult with the Commander, U.S. European Command, to understand his needs and I will work with him to advocate for safe, secure and effective nuclear weapons to meet those needs.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS SECURITY AND HANDLING

Question. What in your view are the most challenging aspects of maintaining security in the handling of nuclear weapons?

Answer. Ensuring nuclear forces are secure from attack, physical damage, theft and misuse, and denying unauthorized access continues to be the standard for nuclear security, and if I am confirmed, this will be one of my top priorities. Our continuing challenge is to ensure our security forces are always provided the capabilities to detect, delay and defeat any adversary while capitalizing on the lessons learned from the past decade of conflict. At the core of this challenge is maintaining a culture of instant readiness in our strategic force personnel for a mission that has a low probability of execution, but only because they are ready in the deterrence role.

Question. What role do you think the Strategic Command should play in ensuring that nuclear weapons are securely stored, transported, and handled when in control of the Military Services?

Answer. As the combatant command responsible for all strategic nuclear forces and now accountable for the security of the U.S. Air Force's strategic nuclear resources, U.S. Strategic Command has an increased role in ensuring a safe, secure and effective nuclear deterrent. If confirmed, I will ensure our security forces continue to have the resources, guidance and training required to maintain a secure environment for our nuclear weapons.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question. In the past, STRATCOM had a stand-alone Science and Technology (S&T) advisor—as other COCOMS currently have, but that role has been subsumed into other staff positions.

If confirmed, what would be your views on reconstituting a STRATCOM Science and Technology advisor and if that is not necessary, what priorities would be assigned to that individual?

Answer. This is something I plan to review if I am confirmed as the Commander of U.S. Strategic Command.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as Commander, U.S. Strategic Command?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JACK REED

U.S. CYBER SECURITY STRATEGY

1. Senator REED. Admiral Haney, does the Air-Sea Battle concept account for the very significant cyber threat to our command and control capabilities in the Asia-Pacific region?

Admiral HANEY. Yes, the Air-Sea Battle concept does incorporate and account for cyber threats in the Asia-Pacific region. While the Concept's title names only two of the warfighting domains, the Concept describes integrated operations across all five domains—air, land, sea, space, and cyberspace—to create advantages for U.S. Forces. In Air-Sea Battle, we must be capable of attack and defense in each warfighting domain.

U.S. Cyber Command (CYBERCOM) is working diligently to ensure that the cyberspace component to Joint operations is prepared to conduct, integrate with, and support both offensive and defensive operations by any Service and in all domains. A significant aspect of CYBERCOM's work is the establishment of cyber mission and support teams specifically focused on understanding regional cyber threats and executing operations to defend our networks against these threats.

2. Senator REED. Admiral Haney, as Commander of U.S. Strategic Command (STRATCOM), is it your understanding that you would develop the strategy and operational plans to combat these cyber threats, not just in the Pacific but across all combatant commands?

Admiral HANEY. Yes, Commander, U.S. Strategic Command is tasked in the Unified Command Plan to exercise combatant command over U.S. Cyber Command and synchronize planning for cyberspace operations in coordination with other combatant commands, the Services, and as directed, appropriate U.S. Government agencies. This includes both offensive and defensive cyberspace operations, directing the Department of Defense network operations and defense, and providing defense support to civil authorities as directed.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

MISSILE DEFENSE OF THE HOMELAND

3. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, do you agree that defending the Homeland against a limited long-range ballistic missile attack should be the first priority of the Missile Defense Agency (MDA)?

Admiral HANEY. Yes, the first priority of the MDA should be defense of the homeland against a limited long-range ballistic missile attack. The Ballistic Missile Defense Review clearly states this as the top priority.

4. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, will you work with the Director of MDA to ensure he has the funding to modernize the ground-based midcourse defense system and to increase testing?

Admiral HANEY. Yes, I will work with the Director of MDA to ensure adequate Research, Development, Test and Evaluation funding supports ground-based midcourse defense (GMD) system modernization and operationally realistic testing. I support MDA stockpile reliability and fleet upgrade activity plans and I also concur with current MDA flight test plans to conduct two GMD intercept tests in fiscal year 2014 and one per year in each subsequent year.

EAST COAST MISSILE DEFENSE

5. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, in your responses to the advance policy questions you state, "With the restructuring of the SM–3 Block IIB program, continuing to explore the possibility of another continental United States (CONUS) interceptor site is a prudent measure."

Why do you believe exploring a third CONUS interceptor site is a prudent measure?

Admiral HANEY. Missile defense is comprised of three major components: interceptors, sensors, and command and control. Exploring a third CONUS site focuses on the first element, interceptors, to include their location and potential battlespace. At the completion of the CONUS Interceptor Site Study we'll have a better understanding of the degree of potential capability/capacity a third site might offer as well as the necessary implementation and sustainment costs for the MDA and the Army. The study will provide a useful basis for evaluating a broad range of alternatives among and between all three missile defense components, particularly improved sensor discrimination.

6. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, what types of preliminary assessments are STRATCOM and U.S. Northern Command (NORTHCOM) conducting regarding an east coast missile defense site?

Admiral HANEY. STRATCOM and NORTHCOM are providing an operational perspective to a Missile Defense Agency study to identify at least three possible candidates for an additional CONUS interceptor site. We are also assessing potential added operational capability and capacity, level of risk reduction that could be achieved, and Service sustainment ability and cost requirements.

7. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, in light of the National Air and Space Intelligence Center's July report that concluded that "Iran could develop and test an ICBM [Intercontinental Ballistic Missile] capable of reaching the United States by 2015", would you agree with me that if we had an east coast site, particularly with the cancellation of the SM3 block 2B program, that it would provide additional battle space in response to an ICBM missile from Iran to the East Coast of the United States?

Admiral HANEY. Yes, an east coast site could potentially provide additional battle space against a limited ICBM launch from Iran. We'll know more once the CONUS Intercept Site Study is complete. While an additional missile defense site may provide operational utility, the most critical near-term priority is to improve sensor capabilities such as coverage and discrimination to maximize the operational utility of the current interceptor inventory. Additionally, consideration of cost versus operational utility and a clear understanding of the threat must be integrated into the decisionmaking process.

8. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, do you agree with the June Homeland Defense Hedging Policy and Strategy report to Congress that said, "The addition of a new missile defense base in the Northeast or Upper Midwest would add battlespace to a potential engagement, allowing for additional decisionmaking time and supporting the future option to employ a Shoot-Assess-Shoot engagement strategy"?

Admiral HANEY. A new missile defense base in the Northeast or Upper Midwest could potentially expand the battlespace and allow for additional decisionmaking time. However, a future option to employ a Shoot-Assess-Shoot engagement strategy involves many more factors such as improvements in discrimination and reliability.

NUCLEAR PRIORITIES

9. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, in 2012, the U.S. National Intelligence Council wrote: "Nuclear ambitions in the United States and Russia over the last 20 years have evolved in opposite directions. Reducing the role of nuclear weapons in U.S. security strategy is a U.S. objective, while Russia is pursuing new concepts and capabilities for expanding the role of nuclear weapons in its security strategy. Other nuclear powers, such as Pakistan and potential aspirants Iran and North Korea, desire nuclear weapons as compensation for other security weaknesses."

What are the potential strategic implications of these divergent views?

Admiral HANEY. As stated in the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review (NPR), one of our key policy objectives is "reducing the role of U.S. nuclear weapons in U.S. national security strategy" to the fundamental role of deterring nuclear attacks. The NPR, however, stated there "remains a narrow range of contingencies in which U.S. nuclear weapons may still play a role in deterring conventional or CBW attack against the United States or its allies and partners. The United States is therefore not prepared at the present time to adopt a universal policy that deterring nuclear attack is the sole purpose of nuclear weapons, but will work to establish conditions to which such a policy could be safely adopted." As some potential adversaries increase their reliance on nuclear weapons, we will continue to evaluate the role nuclear weapons in our own national security strategy. As long as we maintain sufficient safe, secure, and effective nuclear forces to deter nuclear attacks on the United States, its allies, and partners, the relative dependence of others on nuclear weapons should not alter the strategic balance.

10. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, how might this impact the relative balance of power between the United States and Russia?

Admiral HANEY. Whether nuclear threats emanate from Russia or any other nuclear power, the United States will retain a force structure appropriate to deter the employment of nuclear weapons and to control escalation in the event any aggressor chooses to cross the nuclear threshold. I do not believe the relative balance of power between the United States and Russia, will shift as long as we maintain sufficient, safe, secure, and effective nuclear forces.

11. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, how might allies, who depend on U.S. nuclear security guarantees, view this divergence?

Admiral HANEY. As our allies confront new security challenges, we must ensure the U.S. deterrent remains credible while demonstrating our ability and willingness to honor our extended deterrence commitments. Military investments, policies, force posture, and exercises serve to mitigate our allies' potential apprehension of divergent security policies. The B–2 demonstration flight in March 2013, for example, assured our South Korean partners because our mutual belief is it contributed to the deterrence of North Korean aggression.

NUCLEAR DETERRENCE AND ASSURANCE

12. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, what is your view of the role of nuclear weapons in U.S. national security strategy?

Admiral HANEY. Nuclear weapons are the cornerstone of our military's deterrent force and underpin our national security strategy. The 2010 NPR states, "The fundamental role of U.S. nuclear weapons is to deter nuclear attack on the United States, our allies, and partners." The NPR, however, acknowledges that it may be some time before we can reduce our reliance on nuclear weapons solely to this fundamental role. As a result, there remains a "narrow range of contingencies in which U.S. nuclear weapons may still play a role in deterring a conventional or CBW attack against the United States, or its allies and partners."

13. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, what would happen in the event our allies lost confidence in the credibility of the U.S. nuclear umbrella?

Admiral HANEY. In a worst case scenario, allies could take unilateral actions to address perceived threats in the form of direct military action, pursuit of their own nuclear capabilities, or accommodation of potential aggressors. All these actions could destabilize the security environment increasing the potential for armed conflict, proliferation cascades, or other effects harmful to U.S. national security interests.

14. Senator AYOTTE. Admiral Haney, what must the United States do in the coming years to ensure our allies retain their confidence in the credibility of the U.S. nuclear umbrella?

Admiral HANEY. Our allies will remain confident in our security commitments as long as we maintain an appropriate extended deterrence strategy, a nuclear force structured and sized to support it, and demonstrate its effectiveness and flexibility to counter current and emerging nuclear threats. Continued support for the modernization of our nuclear forces, through efforts such as the B61–12 Life Extension Program, is indicative of our long-term commitment and is equally important in instilling confidence among our allies.

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and the chain of command by clearly delineating the combatant commanders' responsibilities and authorities and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. These reforms have also improved cooperation between the Services and the combatant commanders, among other things, in joint training and education and in the execution of military operations.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. No. I do not see the need for modifications at this time.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. Not Applicable.

DUTIES AND QUALIFICATIONS

Question. What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the Commander, United Nations Command/Combined Forces Command/U.S. Forces Korea and what is your understanding of how these different command responsibilities interrelate?

Answer. The Commander, United Nations Command (UNC), serves as commander of the International Command and is responsible for maintaining the United Nations Armistice Agreement on the Korean Peninsula. The Commander, UNC is also responsible for the operational control, strategic direction and combat operations of the UNC member nations' forces during contingencies. The Commander, UNC acts in accordance with the U.N. Security Council resolutions and directives; and also the directives of the U.S. Government as transmitted by Secretary of Defense through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, keeping the U.S. Pacific Command Commander informed.

The Commander of Combined Forces Command (CFC) leads the bi-national U.S.-Republic of Korea (ROK) force and is responsible to support the Armistice Agreement, to deter aggression against the ROK and if deterrence fails, defeat the external threat to the ROK. The commander acts on the direction from the U.S.–ROK

Military Committee, which is the strategic interface between the United States and the ROK national authorities.

The Commander, U.S. Forces Korea (USFK), is a sub-unified command of U.S. PACOM and is responsible for all duties and functions assigned by title 10, U.S.C. and the Unified Command Plan. The Commander, USFK, supports the Armistice Agreements, provides forces to Commander, CFC and UNC, and provides administrative and logistic support necessary to maintain their readiness. Commander, USFK reports through the U.S. Pacific Command Commander to the Secretary of Defense.

These three commands mutually support each other's missions. The CFC and USFK can both provide support to the Armistice functions of the UNC. Similarly, both USFK and UNC can provide support to CFC for the latter's deterrence and defense missions. International support to the CFC is coordinated through the UNC. The close consultative partnership with our ROK ally and the member nations of UNC ensure that these commands are leveraged in a complementary fashion in order to support the national interests of the Republic of Korea and the United States.

Question. What background and experience, including joint duty assignments, do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform these duties?

Answer. If confirmed, my first priority as the UNC/CFC/USFK Commander must be to maintain trained, ready, and disciplined joint and combined forces that are prepared to fight and win. My extensive experience in operations and in command, and with multiple operational deployments prepared me well to assume these duties. I have commanded troops at battalion level during operational deployments to Africa and Bosnia; as Deputy Division Commander of 1st Armored Division in Iraq; the 82d Airborne Division Commander/and Commander of RC-East in Afghanistan, a multi-national command with 26,000 troops and responsible for approximately 40 percent of Afghanistan including the key border region with Pakistan; and most recently in Afghanistan as the U.S. I Corps/ISAF Joint Command Commander responsible for the day-to-day operations of a multi-national force with contributions from 50 Nations. Between these command experiences, I've served in key joint leadership positions such as the Operations Officer for U.S. Central Command and now as the Director of the Joint Staff. These joint, coalition, and interagency experiences provide me the knowledge, skills and insight necessary to lead a large complex, multinational organization and to ensure their readiness to meet the demanding mission in Korea.

Question. Do you believe that there are any steps that you need to take to enhance your expertise to perform the duties of the Commander, United Nations Command/Combined Forces Command/U.S. Forces Korea?

Answer. I have gained invaluable experience serving as the Director of the Joint Staff, and during my previous command of the U.S. Army I Corps at Joint Base Lewis-McChord. I also recognize that there are many individuals in both the ROK and U.S. Governments who have vast experience and knowledge of the ROK-U.S. Alliance. If confirmed, I will seek in depth discussions with experts in our Government, the ROK Government, nongovernmental organizations, and educational/research institutions to develop my personal political, military, economic and cultural knowledge. Also, if confirmed, I will continuously build strong professional relationships that are essential to success as the USFK, UNC, and CFC Commander.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. Section 162(b) of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the chain of command runs from the President to the Secretary of Defense and from the Secretary of Defense to the commanders of the combatant commands. Other sections of law and traditional practice, however, establish important relationships outside the chain of command. Please describe your understanding of the relationship of the Commander, United Nations Command/Combined Forces Command/U.S. Forces Korea with the following officials: the Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Secretaries of the Military Departments, the Chiefs of Staff of the Services, Commander, U.S. Pacific Command, other combatant commanders.

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Department of Defense (DOD) is composed of the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Joint Staff, the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Defense, the combatant commands, the Military Departments, the Defense agencies, Department of Defense Field Activities, and such other offices, agencies, activities, organizations, and commands established or designated by law, or by the President or by the Secretary of Defense, in accordance with sections 111, 113, and 192 of title 10, U.S.C. The functions of the heads of these offices are assigned by the Secretary of Defense in accordance with existing law. The Commander UNC reports to the Secretary of Defense through the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, and through the Secretary of Defense to the President, while at the same time, keeping the Commander, U.S. Pacific Command, informed of any communications with U.S. national authorities. A validated combined U.S.-ROK document provides further guidance on Commander CFC's unique relationship with the ROK National Command and Military Authorities and the U.S. Secretary of Defense.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Deputy Secretary of Defense, in accordance with the authorities contained in title 10, U.S.C., and except as expressly prohibited by law or order of the President or Secretary of Defense, has full power and authority to act for the Secretary of Defense and to exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense upon any and all matters concerning which the Secretary of Defense is authorized to act pursuant to law.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.

Answer. The Under Secretary of Defense for Policy is the Principal Staff Assistant and Advisor to the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense for all matters on the formulation of national security and defense policy, and the integration and oversight of DOD policy and plans to achieve national security objectives.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence.

Answer. The Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence is the Principal Staff Assistant and Advisor to the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense regarding intelligence, counterintelligence, security, sensitive activities, and other intelligence-related matters.

Question. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is the principal military advisor to the President, the National Security Council, the Homeland Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense. Commander UNC communicates through the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, to the Secretary of Defense.

Question. The Secretaries of the Military Departments.

Answer. Subject to the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of Defense, the Secretaries of the Military Departments are responsible for, and have the authority necessary to conduct, all affairs of their respective Departments, including: recruiting; organizing; supplying; equipping to include research and development; training; servicing; mobilizing; demobilizing; administering to include the morale and welfare of personnel; maintaining; construction, outfitting, and repairs of military equipment; and the construction, maintenance, and repair of buildings, structures, and utilities as well as the acquisition, management, and disposal of real property and natural resources.

Question. The Chiefs of Staff of the Services.

Answer. The Chiefs of Staff of the Services are responsible for the organization, training, and equipping of the Services under title 10, U.S.C. Their support is critical to meet readiness needs. The Service Chiefs of Staff also provide military advice to the President, the National Security Council, the Homeland Security Council, the Secretary of Defense, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff as members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Question. Commander, U.S. Pacific Command

Answer. The Commander, U.S. Forces Korea, as commander of a sub-unified command of U.S. Pacific Command (PACOM), reports directly to Commander, PACOM, on matters directly pertaining to USFK areas of responsibility. Commander, United Nations Command and Commander, Combined Forces Command, keep the Commander, PACOM, informed of any communications with U.S. national authorities.

Question. Other combatant commanders.

Answer. The commanders of the combatant commands are responsible to the President and the Secretary of Defense for accomplishing the military missions assigned to them and shall exercise command authority over assigned forces as directed by the Secretary of Defense. The operational chain of command runs from the President to the Secretary of Defense to the commanders of the combatant commands. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff functions within the chain of command by transmitting to the commanders of the combatant commands the orders of the President or the Secretary of Defense.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges that will confront the next Commander, United Nations Command/Combined Forces Command/U.S. Forces Korea (USFK)?

Answer. Based on my study of the security situation on the Korean Peninsula and vital U.S. national interests in Northeast Asia, there are four major and enduring challenges that confront any UNC, CFC, and USFK Commander.

The first challenge is to maintain the Alliance Agreements and to deter the DPRK. Second, to ensure force readiness to fight and win a war with North Korea and to simultaneously prepare for the consequences of a DPRK regime collapse. Third, to maintain a strong U.S.-ROK Alliance to achieve the Security Objectives on the Peninsula. Finally, to execute a cohesive and effective transformation of the Alliance in accordance with the Strategic Alliance 2015. This transformation includes an operational control (OPCON) transition as outlined in Strategic Alliance 2015 Base Plan (SA 2015).

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges and problems?

Answer. If confirmed, I will build strong relationships with the ROK leadership in order to ensure strength, cohesion and confidence in our alliance and our strategy.

If confirmed, I will focus on the readiness of the U.S. and ROK forces in Combined Forces Command to fight tonight and emphasize challenging, realistic and effective joint and combined training required to ensure readiness.

If confirmed, I will work closely with the ROK leadership to develop detail and agreement on the planning, conditions, and metrics required to succeed in the transition of operational control in accordance with Strategic Alliance 2015.

Finally, if confirmed, I will work closely with our Ambassador to provide the leadership necessary to realize U.S. and ROK objectives.

NORTH KOREA

Question. North Korea represents one of the greatest near-term threats to regional security and stability. The seriousness of the threat is seen by North Korea's continued pursuit of nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles. Even without these capabilities, however, North Korea's conventional military force coupled with its history of aggressive and unpredictable behavior underscore the dangerousness of the situation.

What is your assessment of the current security situation on the Korean peninsula?

Answer. I believe North Korea remains the primary threat to security in Northeast Asia. Over the past few years, the security situation on the Peninsula has reached high levels of tension following the March 26, 2010 attack on the ROK navy vessel Cheonan and the artillery shelling of Yeonpyeong Island on 23 Nov 10. In recent months, North Korea defied the will of the international community by conducting tests associated with its nuclear weapons and ballistic missile programs.

North Korea has hindered the progress of Six-Party denuclearization talks; adopted a policy of provocative actions in an attempt to secure concessions and continues its nuclear program. Although its conventional force threat continues to decline, it has compensated by repositioning and redistributing its inventory of conventional artillery, while investing in asymmetric capabilities, such as ballistic missiles, special operations forces, and cyber technology.

I believe our primary concern is the potential for additional North Korean provocations, which is a tool of choice as part of its coercive diplomatic strategy designed to safeguard the regime, maintain internal control, and extort foreign aid. Also, Kim Jong-un's youth and inexperience increase the likelihood of miscalculation, as does the imperative for him to maintain credibility with the military hardliners. These factors make him less predictable in the near-term.

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed to South Korea, Japan, and the United States by North Korea's ballistic missile and weapons of mass destruction capabilities?

Answer. North Korean ballistic missile and nuclear programs pose a direct threat to security in Northeast Asia and could provide an increased threat to the U.S. Homeland in the future. The Kim Regime continues to use these two programs to shape conditions and to gain leverage during negotiations, to extract concessions, and ensure regime survival. North Korea views its WMD and theater ballistic missile programs as sources of international power and prestige, strategic deterrent against the ROK, United States, and Japan, a means of exerting regional influence, and a source of currency derived from export sales.

North Korea possesses extensive short- and medium-range ballistic missile programs with an inventory of several hundred ballistic missiles. North Korea continues to build these missiles of increasing range, lethality, and accuracy, while enhancing the survivability of its missile forces. North Korea's research and development of an Intercontinental ballistic missile, and possible fielding of an intermediate range missile, is a threat to the western United States, Okinawa, Guam, and Alaska. The successful space launch in December 2012 demonstrates an increasing capability as well as an intent to target the United States.

Despite severe fiscal difficulties, North Korea commits significant resources to develop and produce ballistic missiles for both deployment within North Korea and export. This missile development program presents a threat which cannot be ignored.

North Korea reaffirmed its ability to produce a nuclear weapon with its third nuclear test on 12 February 2013 at Punggye. The Intelligence Community assesses that North Korea has sufficient plutonium to produce weapons.

Additionally, there are indications that North Korea has pursued a highly enriched uranium program in the past, and it is likely the effort continues today. In November 2010, North Korea displayed a uranium enrichment facility at Yongbyon to foreign visitors. The facility's purpose, ostensibly, is to produce fuel for a light water reactor currently under construction at the facility. However, this capability could provide an alternative source of highly enriched uranium for use in nuclear weapons.

Question. What is your assessment of North Korea's conventional capabilities and readiness?

Answer. North Korea conventional capabilities (particularly air, naval, ground mechanized, and armor) continue to decline due to shortfalls in equipment modernization and advanced training. However, North Korea boasts the fourth largest Army in the world with more than 70 percent of its forces near the demilitarized zone (DMZ). I also understand that North Korea has adjusted its strategy to focus on asymmetric capabilities with deployments and development of new ballistic missiles and increased emphasis on specialized light infantry and Special Operation Forces.

Question. What, if anything, should be done to strengthen deterrence on the Korean Peninsula?

Answer. I believe the most important factors in strengthening deterrence on the Korean Peninsula are the maintenance of a strong U.S.-ROK Alliance and the readiness of our Joint and Combined Force. Both the ROK and United States continue to invest in improved military capabilities while working toward the transition to a ROK-led allied defense of the Peninsula. In order to strengthen deterrence, the Alliance needs to increase the interoperability between ROK and U.S. Forces, refine command, control, communications, computers, and intelligence (C4I) relationships and capabilities following OPCON transition, and improve the ROK's ballistic missile defense capability.

Question. Do you believe you have adequate resources to defend our allies and national interests if North Korean forces were to move across the DMZ?

Answer. Yes, as I understand it, the U.S. contribution to the combined defense of the Republic of Korea (ROK) is adequate to deter North Korea aggression and to provide decisive joint reconnaissance and operational fires in support of South Korean ground forces if deterrence should fail. Also, the ROK ally has made great strides in modernizing and improving their military readiness. If confirmed, I will conduct a careful and thorough review of the command's readiness and available resources as well as the impact of fiscal realities to ensure we have what is needed to defend our allies and national interests.

Question. What capabilities are the most critical to mounting an effective defense against a North Korean move across the DMZ?

Answer. There are several critical capabilities important in mounting an effective defense, the first of which is a trained and ready ROK force. Also, the United States provides critical ballistic missile defense, intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance, C4I, and joint operational fires capabilities in support of the Alliance. The CDR United Nations Command/Combined Forces Command Commander, and the U.S. senior leaders, provide vital leadership for the combined ROK-U.S. Alliance.

I am aware of the command's ongoing day-to-day engagements with our ROK civil and military counterparts that seek to balance U.S. contributions against existing and emerging ROK capabilities and U.S. national priorities. U.S. augmentation of in-place USFK capabilities also remains an essential component to defeating a potential North Korean aggression and restoring stability to the Korean Peninsula.

Question. What do you perceive are the differences, if any, between Kim Jong Un and his father?

Answer. As I understand it, the main differences between Kim Jong-un (KJU) and his father, Kim Jong-il (KJI), are in the areas of leadership of the military and experience with internal politics. There is a lot we do not know about the new leader. KJU's youth, inexperience, and lack of a track record make it difficult to predict his intentions, actions, and reactions. There is a generational shift, and KJU has been balancing his ideals with a regime effort to reflect his grandfather, Kim Il Sung. Overall, however, I do not believe there has been any significant shift in North Korean regime interests, and do not anticipate any near-term changes in North Korean pursuit of nuclear or missile capabilities.

Question. How do you think increased assertiveness by South Korean and Japanese leadership affects the situation on the Peninsula?

Answer. Cooperation between South Korea and Japan is vital for stability and security in Northeast Asia, and United Nations Command rear bases in Japan are critical for the defense of South Korea. Along with U.S. Ambassador Sung Kim, I will, if confirmed, continue to encourage South Korean and Japanese bilateral and multilateral security cooperation despite recent public friction. I understand the historical and territorial disputes that hinder public support for Korea-Japan bilateral initiatives. However, I am confident that in time of crisis and conflict with North Korea, the United Nations Command will have Japanese support, and the ROK and Japan will work closely together. If confirmed, I will continue to encourage close military cooperation but recognize these issues are heavily dependent upon bilateral discussions between Seoul and Tokyo.

Question. Do you think budget cuts and sequestration will result a reduced carrier presence and U.S. warship presence in the Pacific, and if so, do you think that makes Kim Jong Un more likely to miscalculate or to be more militarily aggressive?

Answer. I know that DOD is committed to the rebalance to the Pacific. However, the effects of full sequestration may lead to a reduction of U.S. warship presence. The presence of U.S. warships in the Pacific has a significant deterrent effect on North Korean military aggression. Pyongyang has not committed a major provocative action when a U.S. carrier group was present in the Korean Theater of Operations. North Korean rhetorical threats against U.S warships and other U.S. capabilities clearly indicate their concern, for which they have no viable military response.

Question. What is your assessment of China's role in managing North Korean behavior and ambitions?

Answer. The China-North Korea relationship has a major impact on North Korean behavior and ambitions. The United States and South Korea continue to pursue diplomatic and security dialogue with Beijing on North Korea issues. I understand China recognizes and shares our interest in stability and a nuclear-free North Korea. It is important for China to recognize the benefits of close coordination with the international community in its efforts to prevent North Korean aggression and encourage responsible behavior.

NORTH KOREAN NUCLEAR PROGRAM

Question. In 2010, North Korea disclosed that it has a functioning uranium enrichment program and earlier this year it announced the intention to restart plutonium production at Yongbyon. These developments, coupled with its underground nuclear tests—the third of which was conducted this year—make it clear that North Korea is determined to pursue nuclear weapons. So, while there may be disagreement on the current status of North Korea's nuclear weapons program, there is general consensus that North Korea will eventually possess nuclear weapons, if they do not already. Moreover, North Korea has a history of proliferating missile and nuclear technology. The Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI) is a means to interdict suspect shipments, including shipments of nuclear or missile items to and from North Korea.

Would you recommend any improvements to the organization or capability of the PSI member nations to improve the ability to interdict prohibited shipments to and from North Korea?

Answer. I fully support this initiative, and if confirmed, I will emphasize the need for multinational cooperation, interest, information sharing, and commitment to preventing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD).

Proliferation prevention is a critical issue for the Korean Theater of Operations. The Republic of Korea has demonstrated their commitment to and leadership in the PSI through their participation in multiple multinational planning events and training exercises, including the Eastern Endeavor Livex Table Top Exercise in September 2012, and the U.S.-UAE Leading Edge 13 exercise this past February.

Recent events have reinforced the need for multinational support in combating the proliferation of WMD. This month, a North Korean-flagged ship was intercepted by the Panamanian military carrying what appeared to be ballistic missiles and other arms en-route from Cuba to North Korea.[1]

Question. In your view, are there additional steps that DOD could take, including with our allies and partners, to ensure that North Korea does not proliferate missile and nuclear technology to countries such as Syria, Iran and others?

Answer. If confirmed, I will assess whether United States or Combined ROK-U.S. Forces can more effectively contribute to the PSI, or other U.S. Pacific Command initiatives. Further, effective counter-proliferation requires interagency and international cooperative efforts integrated with the critical intelligence assets. To effectively deter North Korea's proliferation efforts, it is vital that the current sanctions levied against North Korea be maintained and enforced. This includes not only the United States but also regional and international partners.

Question. In your view, how does the lack of progress in diplomatic efforts to persuade North Korea to verifiably dismantle its nuclear weapons program inform or guide U.S. nuclear deterrence strategy in the region?

Answer. North Korea continues to make progress in its pursuit of nuclear weapons and delivery systems. We need to be consistent and persistent, and we need to continue our diplomatic efforts to close gaps and increase pressure in the regime. I understand the Department is holding ongoing bilateral Extended Deterrence Policy Committee meetings to develop a new ROK-U.S. Alliance tailored deterrence strategy to deal with this growing challenge. I support diplomatic efforts to denuclearize North Korea, and if confirmed, I would ensure that we are prepared to deter and defend against any North Korean nuclear threat.

Question. Do you think North Korea poses a near-term, mid-term, or long-term nuclear threat?

Answer. I believe North Korea's nuclear capabilities pose a long-term threat to U.S. interests.

USFK BALLISTIC MISSILE DEFENSE PRIORITIES

Question. Recent developments in the North Korean ballistic missile program—the successful space launch of a satellite in December 2012 and the display of a road-mobile missile launcher during a parade last year—coupled with the unpredictability of the North Korean regime place a premium on a robust, coordinated missile defense capability in the region.

What is your assessment of the highest priority missile defense needs of U.S. Forces Korea and Combined Forces Command?

Answer. As I understand it, the levels of interoperability we achieved with our partners in the Korean Theater during the most recent North Korean missile launch was unprecedented, however, there is more work to be done. Our ballistic missile defense needs an organic Upper Tier ballistic missile defense capability such as Terminal High Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) or Theater Ballistic Missile capable Aegis ships in order to fully address the North Korean missile threat. While THAAD's temporary deployment to Guam bolsters the PACOM AOR overall ballistic missile defenses, it does not specifically address the ballistic missile defense shortfalls for the Korean Theater of Operations.

Question. What missile defense capabilities do you believe are needed in the near term to meet the operational needs of these commands, and what systems are available to provide such capabilities?

Answer. As I understand, the evolving ballistic missile threat in Korea requires an integrated, layered ballistic missile defense approach. The addition of an upper-tier intercept capability such as the THAAD or ballistic missile defense capable Aegis ships in the near term would complement the Patriot's existing terminal defense capability and significantly enhance ballistic missile defense on the Peninsula. Also, I understand the U.S. and ROK teams continue to identify improvements to the missile defense capability. If confirmed, I will conduct a thorough review of the missile defense capabilities to ensure we are prepared to defend against the North Korea missile threat.

Question. In addition to the deployment of Patriot, THAAD, and Aegis BMD capable ships to the Pacific, what other steps, if any, do you think are necessary to provide adequate protection for U.S., partner, and allied assets?

Answer. We must continue to work on the interoperability and integration of existing and emerging ballistic missile defense systems with our allies and partners. The ability to rapidly and seamlessly share ballistic missile warning, tracking, and engagement information is crucial to providing a missile defense that maximizes protection while preserving scarce resources.

Question. The February 2010 Ballistic Missile Defense Review established a policy of pursuing a Phased Adaptive Approach to regional missile defense, including in Europe, the Middle East, and East Asia. This approach is intended to provide timely and effective defense of existing and emerging missile threats with a flexible set of missile defense capabilities, tailored to each region.

Do you support the Phased Adaptive Approach to missile defense, and do you believe it is an appropriate approach to providing missile defense capabilities for the vicinity of the Korean Peninsula?

Answer. Yes, I do support the Phased Adaptive Approach and believe that it is the appropriate approach to continue to improve the missile defense capabilities on the Korean Peninsula.

Question. In Europe the Phased Adaptive Approach is geared towards protecting additional territory of partners and allies as the Iranian threat capabilities grow.

Since the North Korean capability already threatens partners and allies, what are the phases of the Phased Adaptive approach in the Pacific?

Answer. Specific to the Republic of Korea, I understand that Phase I has been completed through the stationing of U.S. and ROK Patriot forces to defeat short and medium range missiles. Phase II, which is underway, involves increasing partner capabilities and integrating capabilities. The Republic of Korea has committed to upgrading its Patriot forces, and we have made significant strides towards the integration of our ballistic missile defense systems. Phase III is the addition of upper-tier systems such as THAAD or Aegis BMD and more powerful sensors such as AN/TPY–2 to defeat medium and intermediate range missiles.

Question. Do you believe it would be in our security interests to seek a cooperative missile defense relationship with South Korea as a means of enhancing security on the Korean Peninsula and the region?

Answer. Yes, I believe it is in our interest, and I understand that the command is actively seeking a cooperative missile defense relationship. If confirmed as Commander of U.S. Forces in Korea, I would continue to follow through on Alliance agreements reached during the Counter-missile Capabilities Committee to enhance an integrated, comprehensive Alliance counter-missile capability based on a strategy of detecting, defending against, disrupting, and destroying North Korean missile assets.

ROLE OF OTHER REGIONAL COUNTRIES

Question. North Korea's provocative behavior threatens not just security and stability on the Korean Peninsula, but also the security and stability of the entire region.

In your view, what are the roles and responsibilities of other regional countries in helping to manage the threat posed by North Korea's nuclear and ballistic missile programs?

Answer. Not only regionally but internationally, countries have a responsibility to help deter against the North Korean threat. This is why, if confirmed, I would strengthen the role and visibility of the United Nations Command. I believe there is deterrent value in highlighting the UNC role and presence—the Alliance is prepared to fight tonight, but the entire international community has a stake in stability in Northeast Asia.

UNITED STATES-REPUBLIC OF KOREA (ROK) ALLIANCE

Question. Since the end of World War II, the U.S.-ROK alliance has been a key pillar of security in the Asia-Pacific region. This relationship has gone through periods of inevitable change.

What is your impression of the current U.S. security relationship with the ROK?

Answer. It is my understanding the current U.S. security relationship with the ROK is very strong, based on mutual respect and trust and grounded in the Mutual Defense Treaty. In June 2009, the United States and ROK signed a Joint Vision statement that commits both nations to building an alliance that ensures a peaceful, secure, and prosperous future for the Korean Peninsula, the Asia-Pacific region, and the world at large. And recently, President Obama and President Park validated the Joint Vision Statement during their 2013 summit, issuing a Joint Declaration that add impetus to our efforts to modernize and strengthen our Alliance in the service of both of our Nation's interests.

Question. If confirmed, what measures, if any, would you take to improve the U.S.-ROK security relationship?

Answer. I will, if confirmed, continue the work of my predecessors focused on sustaining strong ties with the ROK military and other security-related organizations in the ROK Government. Regular and consistent, in-depth engagement at multiple levels is essential to building mutual understanding and habits of cooperation that will serve our mutual interests and maintain a strong and vibrant relationship in a complex environment.

If confirmed, I will also work to build broader and deeper relationships with the Korean people. In particular, I will encourage continued exchange and cooperation activity between the Command and the people of local Korean communities—activity that form strong Americans and Korean bonds.

Finally, I will work closely with the U.S. Ambassador to Korea and other elements of the U.S. Government to take a flexible, adaptable, and expansive approach to designing and executing Alliance-building initiatives that promote the continuation of a strong U.S.-ROK security relationship.

Question. What is your assessment of ROK warfighting capability trends with regard to the modernization and capability improvements in ROK equipment and training?

Answer. The ROK military remains a capable and motivated force. However, I understand recent USFK assessments indicate the ROK military has critical capability gaps across all the services in interoperability, materiel, manning, and training. The ROK Government in recent bilateral talks has committed to an acquisition timeline and training plan to resolve capability shortfalls. If confirmed, I will work closely with the ROK leadership to assess and validate ROK progress during annual combined joint exercises and other bilaterally agreed forums. Meanwhile, the United States will bridge capability gaps until the ROK military has acquired the capability. There are U.S. capabilities like extended deterrence that the United States will provide for the duration of the Alliance.

Question. What is your understanding of the command relationships between U.S. and ROK forces?

Answer. Based upon my understanding, the current command relationships provide very close cooperation, collaboration, and transparency to fully leverage combined capabilities. The U.S.-ROK command relationships are structured to address the distinct requirements of Armistice, crisis, and wartime conditions. Our crisis action relationships provide the required flexibility to allow a tailored Alliance response to a military crisis on the Peninsula. Today, the ROK Chairman is responsible for the conduct of ROK forces and the defense of South Korea in the Armistice environment. In wartime, the current Alliance command relationships dictate that a U.S. General, Commander of CFC, exercise operational control of Alliance forces, both United States and ROK.

Question. Since the 2010 North Korean attacks against the ROK—the sinking of the South Korea Navy ship Cheonan and the artillery attack on the South Korean island—South Korea has been adamant that it will responded "firmly" to the next such provocation. A main topic during subsequent U.S.-ROK Security Consultative Meetings has been the development of a joint counter-provocation plan, which was reportedly formalized earlier this year.

What is your understanding of how the attacks on the Cheonan and on Yeonpyeong Island changed the ROK and U.S. security posture on the Peninsula?

Answer. These attacks highlighted the threat from North Korea. The Command has since signed a combined Alliance counter-provocation contingency plan that improved the readiness posture and allows for a timely, decisive, proportionate, and coordinated Alliance response to future provocations. CFC/USFK/UNC lines of communication with ROK JCS, U.S. DOD and U.S. National Command Authority (NCA) have been improved and exercised as a result of these two most recent provocations. If confirmed, I would continue such efforts to ensure we are always improving deterrence and, in the event of another provocation, our ability to respond.

Question. What is your understanding of the U.S. obligations in the event of an attack on South Korea by North Korea, and under what circumstances do you believe the U.S. armed forces should be committed to engage North Korean forces in response to an attack on South Korea?

Answer. Under the Mutual Defense Treaty and through our Alliance, we have deterred a major North Korean attack, and maintained our commitment to defend South Korea from external aggression. There are a number of plans that outline specific U.S. commitments and South Korean obligations to coordinate responses to a North Korean provocation or attack.

TRANSFER OF WARTIME OPERATIONAL CONTROL

Question. In June 2010, the United States and ROK agreed to further delay the transfer of OPCON until December 2015. This delay was purportedly agreed to because of the evolving security situation on the Peninsula and in order to more closely synchronize the transfer with other transformation initiatives. According to a recent article in the Washington Post, the ROK has reportedly requested to delay the transfer of beyond December 2015.

Do you favor transfer of wartime operational control to the ROK no later than December 2015?

Answer. Yes, I do favor the transfer of wartime operational control no later than December 2015. The very real threat presented by North Korea, however, dictates that this transition be executed in a manner that does not accept any unnecessary risk to the national security of the ROK. In short, the ROK must meet a detailed set of certification requirements that are, I understand, in accordance with our Strategic Alliance 2015 plan. Although these requirements are based on meeting milestones leading to December 2015, it is important to note that the transition is conditions-driven.

Question. If confirmed, what will you do to help ensure full OPCON transfer is not delayed beyond December 2015?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to execute our Strategic Alliance 2015 plan as directed by agreement of the Secretary of Defense and ROK Minister of National Defense. A principle objective of the theater exercise program in Korea is to train and certify OPCON transition, and I do not anticipate that will change. If confirmed, I will work aggressively with the ROK Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to meet Strategic Alliance 2015 milestones and report progress to the U.S. Chairman, the Secretary of Defense, and the ROK Minister. As we continue forward with OPCON transition, if confirmed, I will continue to provide the best military advice to senior civilian leadership.

Question. Following the decision to delay OPCON transfer to 2015, the United States and ROK entered into an agreement referred to as Strategic Alliance 2015 which is described in the U.S. Forces Korea October 2010 Strategic Digest as "an overarching and synchronized Alliance transformation roadmap, containing mutual Alliance end states and milestones, ensuring a smooth transition of the lead for the combined defense of the Republic of Korea."

What is your understanding of the ROK's current and projected military capabilities and the ability of ROK forces to assume a greater role in the defense of their homeland including responsibility for command and control of the readiness, operations and warfighting of their own forces in wartime ("OPCON Transfer")?

Answer. It is my understanding that the ROK has a highly-trained and capable military that is continuously improving. Their ground force is fully capable of defending the ROK from aggression and defeating a North Korean conventional attack, and they possess an outstanding Fires force that is fully digitized and stands ready to neutralize enemy artillery. ROK naval forces are highly trained and rapidly expanding capabilities to operate in deeper waters. The addition of Aegis-class destroyers aids their ability to control local seas and also improves ballistic missile defense. The ROK Air Force has made great progress in both training and capability in recent years and is fully able to integrate with U.S. Air Force to form a decisive team that, I understand, provides perhaps our largest advantage over our adversary. In the coming years, both ROK Marines and ROK Special Forces will vastly increase their capability and capacity levels, enabling an even more lethal joint and combined team.

With regard to assuming a greater leadership role, I understand the ROK already lead much of the operation in Korea. During routine operations, ROK JCS commands and controls its armed forces. They are responsible for the day-to-day training and readiness of the force. During contingency operations the ROK provides leadership for the ground component. As we move toward OPCON transition, I understand their role in leading theater contingency operations will continue to expand until they assume the overall command and control lead in late-2015.

Question. What is your understanding of the purpose and scope of the Strategic alliance 2015?

Answer. I understand that, in 2009, the U.S. and ROK Presidents agreed the leadership role of defending the ROK in wartime would transfer from a U.S.-led combined command to a ROK-led combined defense structure. To meet this, U.S. and ROK civilian and military leaders developed the Strategic Alliance 2015 initiative to provide an overarching Alliance roadmap containing joint endstates and milestones. It is my understanding that SA 2015 combines the transition of wartime operational control with other Alliance transformational initiatives including the relocation of U.S. Forces south of Seoul and the consolidation of U.S. Forces in Korea into two enduring hubs.

Question. How will it help ensure that the OPCON transfer takes place no later than December 2015, as it is now scheduled?

Answer. In addition to identifying and programming the milestones required to achieve the transition of wartime operational control, Strategic Alliance 2015 also includes a bilateral governance process that allows Alliance civilian and military leadership to monitor and assess progress. This process enables Alliance leadership to engage across the ROK and U.S. Governments as necessary to gain and preserve the required commitments of energy and resources to keep this transformation on track. If confirmed, I will be an active and energetic leader in this process.

Question. South Koreans may be concerned as much or more about U.S. commitment than South Korean capabilities in December 2015.

What steps do you recommend to assure South Korea of U.S. commitment?

Answer. I understand South Korea has raised a number of questions about U.S. commitment in light of the U.S. rebalance to Asia, our fiscal situation, and plans to transition to a ROK-led defense of South Korea. I firmly believe the United States should reassure our ally by maintaining a credible, ready U.S. Force posture and the capability required to meet our Alliance commitments. The United States should also continue to support robust and realistic training exercises, which assure our ROK ally and deter North Korea. Finally, we should sustain close communication through forums such as the Extended Deterrence Policy Committee, the Countermissile Capabilities Committee, and the Military Committee Meetings.

CONSOLIDATION OF U.S. FORCES

Question. The Land Partnership Plan (LPP) is consolidating the combat brigade and supporting elements of the Second Infantry Division in and around Camp Humphreys, south of Seoul. U.S. costs associated with implementing the LPP are estimated at $3.2 billion, and that does not include hundreds of millions of dollars in transition costs for sustaining facilities until the move is completed. The Yongsan Relocation Plan (YRP) proposes to move most of the U.S. Forces currently stationed at Yongsan compound in Seoul to Camp Humphrey as well. The YRP relocation is to be largely funded by the Republic of Korea (ROK) Government, but the United States will face potentially significant costs as well.

What is the current status of the two consolidation plans and the timeline for completion?

Answer. It is my understanding that both the YRP and Land Partnership Plan (LPP) are on track to meet Strategic Alliance 2015 milestones. Construction will be complete by the end of 2015 and unit moves complete by the end of 2016. This multi-billion dollar bilateral program is receiving close USFK oversight that is accountable to both the U.S. and Republic of Korea Governments in order to continue to keep it on track. If confirmed, I will continue to provide critical oversight of these relocation efforts.

Question. In your opinion, does the consolidation better support the warfighting mission? If so, how?

Answer. Yes, consolidation better supports the warfighting mission in several ways: it postures forces, specifically the 8th Army and 2nd Infantry Division, to increase readiness through better coordination, synchronization, and oversight of its subordinate units; postures forces to better execute contingency missions; and, through co-location, it increases the cohesiveness of our force in Korea. I do have a couple concerns for specific units. If confirmed, I intend to review these planned moves.

Question. What do you anticipate to be the total costs, including transition costs, to be incurred by the U.S. Government to carry out the two consolidations?

Answer. The estimated U.S. appropriated costs related to the LPP program are $884.6 million, which includes U.S. military construction, moving services, furniture, fixtures, equipment, and C4I requirements. These cost estimates were recently validated by the Army Staff in March 2013. The remaining costs are paid for through host nation burden sharing or directly by the Republic of Korea Government. The costs for executing YRP will be funded completely by the Republic of Korea Government. I understand this is a sensitive issue. If confirmed, I will conduct a thorough review of the associated costs to ensure the judicious use of taxpayer funds.

Question. Given that the U.S.-ROK Status of Forces Agreement states that the United States is not obligated to restore facilities and areas to their original condition when they are returned to the ROK, to what extent to you believe the United States should compensate the ROK for the costs related to environmental clean-up at bases being vacated as a result of the LPP?

Answer. I take environmental protection, human health and public safety issues very seriously. DOD policies are straight forward and clear regarding overseas environmental remediation. If confirmed, I will ensure those policies are fully implemented. It is also my understanding that the Republic of Korea and U.S. Governments have an established and effective means of communication regarding environmental issues. If confirmed, I will ensure we continue to cooperate closely and transparently with the Republic of Korea on all environmental matters.

Question. During its review of U.S. costs and allied contributions to support U.S. military in Korea and elsewhere, the Senate Armed Services Committee reviewed the full list of construction projects under consideration at Camp Humphreys. Some of those projects appear to be of questionable value and necessity. Others raised questions as to whether they were the most economical way to meet requirements.

If confirmed, what would you do to ensure that the full list of construction projects planned at Camp Humphreys is focused on meeting mission critical requirements and doing so in the most cost effective way?

Answer. If confirmed, I will review the Senate Armed Services Committee (SASC) report, review our plans, and ensure all construction resources are focused on the highest priority U.S. operational and force readiness requirements across all services and all bases in Korea. USFK's comprehensive campaign plan, to include the theater infrastructure master plan, appears to be an effective mechanism to prioritize these requirements.

HOST NATION BURDEN-SHARING PROGRAMS

Question. The United States and ROK currently operate under a "Special Measures Agreement" (SMA) in which the ROK contributes toward U.S. costs associated with maintaining U.S. Forces in the country. A recent SASC review, entitled Inquiry into the U.S. Costs and Allied Contributions to Support the U.S. Military Presence Overseas, found that ROK SMA contributions are not keeping pace with the growth in U.S. costs.

What is your assessment of the current level and quality of the burden-sharing arrangement?

Answer. It is my understanding that the ROK provides cost sharing support for U.S. Forces stationed in Korea through the SMA program. SMA contributions are divided into three categories: labor, supplies and services, and construction. SMA support plays a key role in developing and maintaining force readiness by providing the Korean workers needed to support the force, making valuable supplies and services available, and building and modernizing facilities. Since negotiations are underway over a new SMA, I will refrain from commenting on this issue, but believe that the ROK should provide an appropriate level of support to maintain U.S. Forces in Korea.

Question. The Department has said that it expects negotiations for a new SMA to begin this summer.

What steps will you take to ensure those negotiations result in a fair sharing of the costs of maintaining the United States' military presence in ROK?

Answer. It is my understanding that the United States is pursuing a requirements-based approach during ongoing State Department led negotiations over a post-2013 SMA. If confirmed, I will examine opportunities to ensure that our ROK ally provides fair and appropriate levels of cost sharing support.

Question. A significant percentage of burden-sharing funds in recent years have been used to carry out construction supporting the consolidation of U.S. Forces at Camp Humphreys.

Do you believe this funding trend should be continued, or that funding should be spread to critical requirements at other U.S. bases in the ROK?

Answer. I have been informed that some ROK SMA contributions will continue to go to U.S. construction obligations under the Land Partnership Plan into 2014. This allows the United States to meet its obligations under the Strategic Alliance 2015 plan and the Land Partnership Plan. My intention, if confirmed, is to use ROK SMA contributions to continue to resource the highest priority U.S. operational and force readiness requirements across all Services and all bases in Korea. USFK's comprehensive campaign plan, to include the theater infrastructure master plan, appears to be an effective mechanism to prioritize these requirements.

Question. The committee's review of U.S. costs and allied contributions to support U.S. military in Korea and elsewhere raised concern about the manner in which USFK accounts for host nation contributions in some cost benefit analyses. For example, the economic analyses of certain projects at Yongsan do not consider costs paid with host nation contributions, in effect, treating those contributions as "free money".

Do you agree that, in conducting cost benefit analyses, USFK should account for host-nation contributions, whether they be in cash or in-kind, in the same manner as appropriated funds?

Answer. I believe these contributions are a vital component of covering the costs of stationing U.S. Forces in Korea. This valuable resource must be managed in a responsible and effective manner. If confirmed, I will ensure that I understand how ROK burden sharing funds are incorporated into cost benefit analysis that support proposed courses of action.

Question. What steps would you propose to improve oversight of how host nation funds are spent in the ROK?

Answer. I agree that oversight of host nation cost sharing support is essential to ensure this valuable resource is used in the most effective and efficient manner. If confirmed, my intention is to comply with all policy and statutory requirements. Additionally, I intend to ensure we continue oversight procedures for U.S. military planning efforts in the ROK in close coordination with U.S. Pacific Command, the Joint Staff, and DOD.

TRAINING OF U.S. FORCES IN THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA

Question. One of the challenges for the U.S. troops on the Korean Peninsula is training, particularly the access to training ranges for large ground unit maneuver and fires and for close air support missions.

What is your understanding of the training challenges for U.S. Forces in the ROK, including the availability and access to training ranges for large ground unit maneuver and fires, close air support, and other Air Force training requirements?

Answer. Availability and access to training ranges, I understand, continues to create significant challenges for Air Force Units on peninsula. The limited number of ranges and the requirement to share range time with our ROK partners causes significant training shortfalls. Range restrictions further limit opportunities to maintain proficiency in certain mission sets. 7th Air Force (7AF) units mitigate these shortfalls through off-peninsula deployments and training exercises.

For ground, maritime, naval, and special operations components, I understand, ranges and training areas are sufficient to achieve both service standards in training as well as unique mission training requirements with few exceptions. Live fire and maneuver training is conducted on U.S. Army, ROK Army, ROK Air Force, ROK Navy, ROK Special Forces, and ROK Marine Force ranges and training maneuver areas. The training areas notably include maritime forcible entry operations (over the beach maneuver) as well as blue water maneuver areas.

Question. In your view, are the ranges in Korea adequate to meet the training requirements of U.S. Forces?

Answer. It is my understanding that conditions for a fully trained force are met across all the components through innovative training both on and off the Peninsula. For all components, CFC is capable of executing tremendous live, virtual, constructive, and gaming capabilities to exercise bilateral, joint, and combined operations. This capability is showcased biannually during exercises Key Resolve and Ulchi Freedom Guardian, and the result is a highly trained force at the operational and high tactical level of war.

For ground, maritime, naval, and special operations components, ranges and training areas are sufficient to achieve both service standards in training as well as unique mission training requirements with few exceptions. Live fire and maneuver training is conducted on U.S. Army, ROK Army, ROK Air Force, ROK Navy, ROK SOF, and ROK Marine Force ranges and training maneuver areas. The maneuver and live fire exercise training areas are capable of supporting reinforced Company size elements. The training areas notably include maritime forcible entry operations (over the beach maneuver) as well as blue water maneuver areas.

The air component has the greatest challenges with on-Peninsula training ranges due to local restrictions and language barriers on the ROK-only ranges. The 7AF has mitigated these challenges through innovative use of the two dual-use ROKAF and Air Force training ranges and integration of off-Peninsula training exercises to cover local training gaps.

Question. How will the overall readiness reduction of U.S. Forces due to budget cuts and sequestration, as forecast by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Service Chiefs, impact U.S. Force capabilities in Korea?

Answer. U.S. Force capabilities in Korea are inherently joint and require contributions from all services across all domains. I understand that USFK depends on Service providers to meet capability requirements; any impact to the Services will impact current theater capabilities, and the capabilities of planned reinforcements which are instrumental to mission accomplishment.

TOUR NORMALIZATION IN SOUTH KOREA

Question. Prior to 2012, the Defense Department had contemplated full tour normalization for U.S. military personnel assigned to the Korean Peninsula. In March 2012, USFK's Commander said that DOD was "not able to afford Tour Normalization at this time."

Do you agree that full Tour Normalization is unaffordable? Please explain.

Answer. Yes, Tour Normalization is unaffordable and unnecessary considering USFK's mission and posture. USFK determined that the cost of the initiative is not affordable, and there may be other options to improve readiness. PACOM agreed with the assessment and removed it from the PACOM 2012 Theater Posture Plan. Subsequently, DOD stopped pursuing Tour Normalization as an initiative for Korea.

Question. USFK continues to face the challenge of funding infrastructure to support the large increase in Command Sponsored Families that resulted from Phase I of Tour Normalization—including the cost of family housing. The Committee's recent review of U.S. costs and allied contributions to support U.S. military in Korea and elsewhere concluded that approval of the U.S. Army's plan for a public-private partnership to build family housing at Camp Humphreys "would substantially increase long-term costs for U.S. taxpayers and set a troubling precedent for future military housing plans."

Given the unaffordability of the previously proposed Army's plan for family housing at Camp Humphreys, if confirmed, will you investigate alternate plans for providing family housing for servicemembers assigned to Camp Humphreys?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I will investigate alternative plans, which is necessary to meet USFK's readiness requirements.

QUALITY OF LIFE

Question. Through investment in quality of life amenities, to include housing, health care, and recreation, the Department has worked to achieve the goal of making South Korea an "assignment of choice" for U.S. Forces.

What do you consider to be the most essential quality of life programs for soldiers and their families stationed in Korea and, if confirmed, what would be your goals in this regard?

Answer. I believe the most essential quality of life programs for servicemembers and their families serving in the Republic of Korea are access to quality living and working conditions and facilities, quality health care, and quality educational opportunities for dependent family members. If confirmed, I will advocate for and take actions to provide our servicemembers and family members with the best possible living and working environment, health care services, and educational opportunities for dependent family members.

Question. What is your understanding of the capacity of DOD schools in South Korea to accommodate the increase in families/children associated with tour normalization?

Answer. I understand the schools in Korea are being constructed to support a student population based upon the currently authorized 4,645 command sponsored families.

MEDICAL CARE FOR U.S. FORCES IN KOREA

Question. One of the most important quality of life issues in Korea is ensuring access to high quality medical care for servicemembers of all military branches and their families. Separate medical chains of command responsible for providing health care, and the presence of non-command-sponsored family members who need health services, among other factors, have presented challenges.

If confirmed, how would you assess the management and delivery of health care services in South Korea for both command and non-command sponsored family members?

Answer. Command sponsored family members are enrolled in TRICARE Prime and receive the same health benefits as active duty servicemembers and activated National Guard/Reserve members. Additionally, the host nation system accepts TRICARE and is robust enough to provide care to both Command Sponsored and non-Command Sponsored Families.

I understand South Korea's advances in specialty care—to include surgical care, imaging, and therapeutics—is among the best in the world, with six institutions with whom U.S. Forces Korea conducts business certified in the Joint Commission International Surveys the last 2 years.

If confirmed, I will continue to monitor and assess the availability and quality of health care for our servicemembers, civilians, and their families serving in the Republic of Korea.

SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

Question. DOD and the Military Services have developed comprehensive policies and procedures to prevent and respond to incidents of sexual assault, including providing appropriate resources and care for victims of sexual assault. However, numerous incidences of sexual misconduct involving military personnel continue to occur. In 2012, for the fourth year in a row, there were more than 3,000 reported cases of sexual assault in the military, including 2,558 unrestricted reports, and an additional 816 restricted reports. Moreover, a recent survey conducted by the DOD indicates that the actual number of sexual offenses could be considerably higher, as 6.1 percent of active duty women and 1.2 percent of active duty men surveyed reported having experienced an incident of unwanted sexual contact in the previous 12 months.

What is your assessment of the current sexual assault prevention and response program in USFK?

Answer. USFK takes the prevention of sexual assaults very seriously. Sexual assault is a crime that violates basic human dignity and the standards of decency that we are sworn to uphold and protect. We cannot allow sexual assaults to injure our servicemembers and families, erode trust in each other and our institutions, or compromise readiness.

All Services have commander-driven programs, with engaged leadership at all levels. These programs focus on education and culture, positive changes to the environment, and strict enforcement of standards to eliminate sexual assaults in our formations.

Commanders will continue to aggressively investigate every allegation of sexual assault and hold accountable those who cannot live by our standards.

Question. In your view, does the current sexual assault prevention and response program in USFK adequately address issues regarding sexual assaults involving DOD contractor personnel?

Answer. Yes, as I understand it, the sexual assault prevention and response program in USFK adequately addresses issues regarding sexual assaults involving DOD Contractors.

I understand that DOD Contractors serving in Korea have access to USFK sexual assault prevention and sexual assault response training resources and command policies. Additionally, contractors that are sexual assault victims have access to most USFK victim advocate resources.

In Korea, I understand the Command often partners with local law enforcement in investigating and prosecuting sexual assaults committed by contractor personnel and either they will be prosecuted under Korean Law or they will be returned to the United States and prosecuted by the Department of Justice under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act (MEJA).

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of the training and resources in place to investigate and respond to allegations of sexual assault in the USFK area of responsibility?

Answer. I understand that the training and resources in place to investigate and respond to allegations of sexual assault in the USFK area of responsibility is high-quality. U.S. Criminal Investigation Command (CID) recently stationed a Sexual Assault Investigator in Korea who provides direct guidance, review, and management of all CID sexual assault investigations in Korea. Each CID office in Korea has assigned multiple agents trained for interviewing sexual assault victims in support of sexual assault investigations. Trial Counsel works closely with agents as the agents investigate these offenses. If confirmed, I will closely review the adequacy of these resources.

Question. What is your view of the provision for restricted and unrestricted reporting of sexual assaults? Are you aware of any problem with the manner in which confidential reporting has been implemented and applied?

Answer. I agree with the current reporting options and am not aware of any systemic problem with the manner in which confidential reporting has been implemented and applied.

Protecting victims is paramount to ensuring that we get timely reports of sexual assaults and gain confidence within our ranks that leadership will do what is right. The recent change in DOD strategic plan guidance has helped eliminate barriers to reporting sexual assaults within our formations.

The use of restricted and unrestricted reports serve as valuable options to our overall sexual assault program. They improve the military justice process to ensure more timely, thorough and efficient reporting, investigations and accountability.

Question. What is your view of the willingness and ability of commanders to hold assailants accountable for their acts?

Answer. Commanders care very deeply about this issue and they are up to the task. The commander is central to all we do in military units. We entrust them with tremendous responsibility and special trust and we must hold them accountable for reinforcing the highest standards of respect and trust. A foremost responsibility of all commanders is to maintain good order and discipline. Sexual assault eats at the core of the trust, respect, cohesiveness, and readiness that sustains our military. There is no doubt that all commanders must redouble their efforts to eliminate this problem; there are no shortcuts. I am confident, though, of the ability and willingness of our commanders to tackle the problem.

Question. What is your view about the role of the chain of command in changing the military culture in which these sexual assaults have occurred?

Answer. Commanders at every level are responsible for the behavior of their personnel and for the climate in their unit. Leaders must lead by example and instill the importance of standards, values and discipline in our formations.

I understand USFK Headquarters has established a USFK Sexual Assault Task Force co-chaired by the USFK Deputy Chief of Staff and Command Sergeant Major. Established in June 2012, this working group meets monthly to coordinate efforts with components and experts on prevention measures, training factors, and sharing of best practices. Results and required actions are briefed directly to the USFK Commander.

If confirmed, I plan to use this working group to review policies and programs that directly affect our sexual assault prevention and response program.

Question. In your view, what would be the impact of requiring a judge advocate outside the chain of command to determine whether allegations of sexual assault should be prosecuted?

Answer. The commander's role in military justice is longstanding and essential to the effectiveness of command in our forces. Removing commanders from the military justice system would signal a lack of confidence in our commanders that would undermine good order and discipline. It would foster doubt in our servicemembers in the competency and abilities of their commanders that are entrusted with their lives. The maintenance of good order and discipline is the responsibility of the commander. Removing this responsibility would certainly erode the ability of a commander to effectively command his unit.

Question. If confirmed, what actions would you take to ensure senior level direction and oversight of efforts to prevent and respond to sexual assaults and to hold assailants accountable for their actions?

Answer. If confirmed, I will lead by example. I will immediately review the associated policies and regulations and ensure effective prevention, reporting and response; including the establishment of critical and prioritized reporting requirements that ensure my immediate awareness of an assault in the command.

I am confident that commanders take the responsibilities and authorities they have under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, with the utmost seriousness and will hold assailants accountable for their actions.

If confirmed, I will publish in writing and communicate in multiple means my priorities and guidance.

I will personally check the execution of my directives and the health of the environment through personal engagement with servicemembers and commanders.

I will emphasize the importance of a healthy command climate and require accountability of commanders for their environment.

I will form a multi-functional team that continuously explores prevention and response actions to close gaps and the implement best practices.

PREVENTION OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING

Question. Following media reports connecting prostitution and human trafficking in Korea to U.S. military forces, Commander, U.S. Forces Korea, in 2004 instituted a zero tolerance policy regarding the illegal activities of prostitution and human trafficking. Under this policy, all USFK personnel, military and civilian, as well as contractors and their employees, are expected to comply with prohibitions, including observance of curfews and laws regarding off-limits areas and establishments, aimed at curtailing these practices.

What effects have changes in U.S. policy, as well as new criminal laws implemented by the ROK, had on the incidence of prostitution and human trafficking in Korea?

Answer. It is my understanding that U.S. and USFK policy has significantly increased education and awareness of prostitution and human trafficking activity, but recorded incidents are too few to note statistically meaningful changes.

USFK maintains a zero tolerance policy and places establishments suspected of prostitution and/or human trafficking activity off-limits via the Armed Forces Disciplinary Control Board process.

The Air Force component has been especially aggressive in recent months and has been successful in eliminating prostitution and human trafficking activity in the majority of establishments outside one base, and are aggressively pursuing action at another location.

USFK heads a Combating Trafficking in Persons Task Force and works closely with each component and the U.S. Embassy staff to monitor prostitution and human trafficking activity and work cooperatively to combat it.

Question. What further changes, if any, to the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and military regulations are needed in your judgment to ensure maximum effectiveness of the zero tolerance policy?

Answer. I believe the UCMJ is well equipped to meet the challenges of indiscipline in our Armed Forces, to include allegations of prostitution and human trafficking. It is a crime under the UCMJ to engage in pandering and prostitution, and patronizing a prostitute. While the UCMJ does not specifically address human trafficking, human trafficking crimes are prosecuted under the UCMJ through charges of unbecoming, violation of a General Order, or violation of existing Federal laws criminalizing trafficking through assimilation.

Question. If confirmed, what steps would you take to further enhance the effectiveness of the zero tolerance policy?

Answer. If confirmed, I will reinforce efforts of the Armed Forces Disciplinary Control Board which is the Department of the Defense program to address problems with off-post establishments, through training and public awareness efforts. I will ensure my area commanders continue to work with local communities to eliminate prostitution and human trafficking.

NORTH KOREA-POW–MIA RECOVERY EFFORTS

Question. From 1996–2005, the United States worked with the North Korean military to recover and repatriate the remains of American servicemembers who perished on the Korean peninsula. In the spring of 2005, the United States halted the program and, despite efforts last year to restart the program, there has been no recovery operations since.

In your opinion, under what conditions should the United States work with North Korea to repatriate the remains of American servicemembers found in North Korea?

Answer. Although I cannot speak for national-level policy makers, from an operational perspective, I believe that a successful resumption of remains recovery operations in North Korea should be based upon North Korean guarantees for the safety and security of the U.S. servicemembers and civilians participating in the recovery operations and that the repatriations should be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the 1953 Armistice Agreement.

REGIONAL POSTURE

Question. In your opinion, how should the United States employ its forces in ROK to provide for regional presence and engagement, and to best respond to regional threats, provide support for out-of-area contingencies, and maintain readiness?

Answer. Readiness to "Fight Tonight" is the number one priority and focus for USFK. I understand U.S. Forces in the ROK currently provide regional presence and engagement through participation in regional exercises.

Employment must primarily support Deter, Defend, and Defeat in armistice and crisis on the Korean Peninsula. U.S. and ROK force employment will remain flexible enough to support U.S. Pacific Command Theater Security Cooperation in limited increments, in order to support response to regional threats and out-of-area contingencies.

Employment and regional exercises will continue to promote regional peace and support U.S. regional partners and allies. These engagement efforts will best train our forces for contingency operations to respond to regional threats and also maintain readiness.

Question. What adjustments, if any, do you anticipate having to make to your strategy if current budget cuts and sequestration cuts remain in place?

Answer. I believe the fundamental strategy of UNC, CFC, and USFK will remain unchanged—we will continue to deter, maintain readiness, and engage with our ROK allies and U.N. Sending State partners. We will, however, have to carefully prioritize our resources to maintain readiness and capabilities within cost constraints.

Question. What additional strategic risks do you think you will have to assume over the next 5 years in your area of responsibility if the current budget cuts and sequestration cuts remain in place?

Answer. I see increased risks in terms of Alliance military readiness to meet increasing North Korean investments in asymmetric capabilities in various areas, including cyber and nuclear-capable missiles. Additionally, a reduction in resources could erode the confidence of our ROK allies in the strength of our deterrent and warfighting capabilities, and our commitment to their defense.

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as Commander, United Nations Command/Combined Forces Command/U.S. Forces Korea?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

RECOVERY EFFORTS IN NORTH KOREA

1. Senator AYOTTE. Lieutenant General Scaparrotti, the United States estimates there are 43 servicemembers missing who served in North Korea. Do you commit to working with U.S. Pacific Command (PACOM) and Joint Prisoner of War/Missing in Action (MIA) Accounting Command (JPAC) in order to support efforts to resume MIA recovery operations in North Korea?

General SCAPARROTTI. I remain committed to working with PACOM and JPAC to resume the MIA recovery operations in North Korea. From an operational perspective, I believe that a successful resumption of remains recovery operations in North Korea should be based upon North Korean guarantees for the safety and security of the U.S. servicemembers and civilians participating in the recovery operations and that the repatriations should be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the 1953 Armistice Agreement.

SEQUESTRATION IMPACT ON U.S. FORCES KOREA

2. Senator AYOTTE. Lieutenant General Scaparrotti, what are your concerns regarding the impact of sequestration on readiness of U.S. Forces in Korea?

General SCAPARROTTI. Although U.S. Forces Korea currently has a very high priority for funding and resources, I see increased risks on Alliance military readiness to meet increasing North Korean investments in asymmetric capabilities in various areas, including cyber and nuclear-capable missiles. Additionally, a reduction in trained and ready resources could erode the confidence of our ROK allies in the strength of U.S. deterrent and warfighting capabilities. In particular, full sequestration will ultimately reduce the readiness of response forces in CONUS that would deploy to Korea if deterrence fails.

USFK will continue to carefully prioritize resources and work diligently with the Services to maintain readiness and capabilities within cost constraints. I intend to closely monitor readiness levels.

COMBAT OPERATIONS AND IMPACT ON U.S. NATIONAL SECURITY INTERESTS

3. Senator AYOTTE. Lieutenant General Scaparrotti, according to the 2012 Strategic Guidance, the United States now seeks to be able to conduct one major combat operation while only denying the objective of an opportunistic aggressor in a second region. This is a reduction from the longstanding goal of being able to conduct two simultaneous major combat operations.

As the next Commander of U.S. Forces in Korea, how does this change from two major combat operations to one and a half, impact your thinking?

General SCAPARROTTI. This construct is based on recognition of limited resources resulting from our constrained fiscal environment. These constraints can lead to greater risk, demanding a continual assessment of the strategic landscape and effective balance of resources. As the next Commander of U.S. Forces in Korea, my priority is to deter aggression against the Republic of Korea and if deterrence fails, defeat the threat. Maintaining stability on the Korean Peninsula and the Northeast Asia region requires the ability to "Fight Tonight". If U.S. Forces in Korea are called upon to act, we will need priority access to the resources required to undertake these missions. I will continue to evaluate the risk on the Peninsula and work closely with the U.S. Pacific Commander and the Services to ensure we have forces trained and ready.

4. Senator AYOTTE. Lieutenant General Scaparrotti, if our national security interests require us to intervene in Syria or Iran, does this 1.5 assumption for defense planning undercut the resources you might have available should hostilities break out on the Korean peninsula?

General SCAPARROTTI. Current plans take into account realistic force availability. Depending on the type and number of forces required if intervention in Syria or Iran is directed, it could have an adverse effect on resources available.

5. Senator AYOTTE. Lieutenant General Scaparrotti, would this 1.5 assumption make it more likely that North Korea might undertake opportunistic aggression if we intervene elsewhere?

General SCAPARROTTI. South Korean and U.S. military capabilities on the Peninsula have effectively deterred major North Korean military aggression for 60 years. We believe that Pyongyang recognizes these capabilities and knows it lacks the resources and foreign support necessary to execute a major attack should the United States be committed elsewhere.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. Good morning, everybody. The committee meets this morning to consider the nominations for a number of important and challenging assignments within the Department of Defense (DOD).

We welcome Deborah James, who is nominated to be Secretary of the Air Force; Jessica Wright, who is nominated to be Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness; Frank Klotz, nominated to be the Under Secretary of Energy for Nuclear Security; Marcel Lettre, nominated to be Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence; and Kevin Ohlson, nominated to be a judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

We also welcome your family members here this morning. The committee recognizes the immense contribution which are made by families and other friends for the success of the efforts which you undertake. We thank them for joining us today.

Our witnesses, during their opening statements, should feel free to introduce family members and others who are here to be with them today.

We're especially pleased to welcome back to our committee Senator Conrad, who is a—I won't say an "old friend," because he still looks a lot younger than he did when he left the Senate. I hope there is a connection between the two, for personal reasons. [Laughter.]

But, he's been a dear friend of all of us, and he made such a contribution here, when he was here, that we think about him all the time. Please feel welcome here as you introduce Mr. Klotz, and say hi to Lucy for us, too, if you would.

The positions to which the witnesses have been nominated are some of the most demanding in the Department of Defense. We thank all of our nominees for their commitment and dedication, and especially for their willingness to continue to serve our country.

The Secretary of the Air Force is responsible for seeing to all Department of the Air Force affairs, including organizing, training, equipping, and providing for the welfare of nearly 330,000 Active Duty men and women, 176,000 Air National Guard and Air Force Reserve members, 186,000 civilians and their families. If confirmed, Ms. James will assume control at a time of immense fiscal challenge. Her responsibility to oversee the Air Force's annual budget of more than $110 billion is going to require the wise balancing of risk across the force while also ensuring core Air Force capabilities remain robust.

The Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness is the Secretary of Defense's senior policy advisor on a range of issues, including total force management, military and DOD civilian personnel policy, healthcare, and compensation. If confirmed for this position, Ms. Wright will play a critical role in the Department's efforts to address many difficult issues; chief among them, eliminating the scourge of sexual assault and sexual harassment in our military. Ms. Wright is no stranger to the rigors of this position, having already served in an acting capacity for several months.

If confirmed as the Under Secretary of Energy for Nuclear Security, Mr. Klotz will be the administrator for the National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA). His responsibilities will include overseeing the safety, reliability, and performance of the Nation's nuclear weapons stockpile and promoting international nuclear safety and nonproliferation. Mr. Klotz has held numerous positions in the fields of arms control and nuclear policy, including advising the President as the Director for Nuclear Policy and Arms Control on the National Security Council staff, experiences that will surely serve him well.

The Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence is a new position that will serve as the primary staff assistant and advisor to the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence. His responsibilities will include policy and strategic oversight of all DOD intelligence activities, counterintelligence and security policy, plans and programs, and exercise planning. Mr. Lettre has spent several years in the halls of the Pentagon, where he's currently serving as the Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense, and, prior to that, as the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Legislative Affairs.

Mr. Ohlson, if confirmed, will join four other civilian judges as a member of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the highest court for military personnel on Active Duty and others subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and others subject to the UCMJ beside personnel who are on Active Duty. The court exercises jurisdiction over all appeals from U.S. military courts and is a vital part of the military justice system. Mr. Ohlson has many years of relevant experience, serving currently as the chief of the Department of Justice's Professional Misconduct Review Unit and previously in the Office of the Attorney General and as a Judge Advocate General (JAG) in the Army. This extensive background makes Mr. Ohlson a strong candidate for this judicial role.

Again, we welcome all of our nominees today. We look forward to your testimony.

I now will call on Senator Inhofe.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. You've done a good job of describing what you guys are going to be involved in, but, at the risk of sounding negative, I look at some of the problems that you'll be faced with. General Klotz, you'd be taking the reins of the NNSA at a time that is really difficult right now. I think you know that, and I'm anxious to hear your testimony.

Congress has serious concerns about the management of the administration, especially in respect to the cost-growth schedule slippage in all of that. We look forward to your thoughts on that.

Ms. Wright, again, I apologize for not having been there when you were at our scheduled visit, but we had a chance to visit vicariously anyway. You've served as the Acting Under Secretary since January of this year, and have been involved in a lot of important but controversial things. I am concerned about your thoughts on sexual assault, religious expression. I'm troubled by your September 4, 2013, decision concerning administrative leave. I'm also concerned about the impact of our civilian personnel furloughs. I know that we suffered some 24,000, just in my State of Oklahoma, 14,000 just at Tinker Air Force Base. It is serious, and I'm just wondering what we are accomplishing from that.

Ms. James, the Air Force is forced to ground a third of its combat-coded Active squadrons for a time during 2013. According to the Chief of Staff of the Air Force, it will now cost a minimum of 10 percent more for flying hours to recover, back where we were. It's a tough time that you're getting into that position.

It's also been reported that the Air Force is considering the retirement of its entire fleets of aircraft, including the A–10s, F–15Cs, B–1s, and the KC–10s. I'm very much concerned about this. It's a disarming of America that bothers me a great deal.

Mr. Lettre, if confirmed, you'll be confronted with a number of significant challenges, including the ongoing uncertainty in Syria, and then the challenges in Iran, which have always concerned me more than the problems in Syria, quite frankly. The cyber operations, the development of a national cyber force, are also things that are going to be—you're right in at the ground floor of that—a matter of keeping up with the competition. It's going to be tough.

Finally, Mr. Ohlson, in terms of military justice, I know there are people like Senator Graham and others who have had a lot more personal experience. I go all the way back to before you guys were born, when I was in the Army and was a court reporter for the justice system, and I've developed some pretty strong feelings about it since that time.

I look at you, and I wonder why in the world you're doing this, but I'm glad you are, and we're anxious to hear your testimony.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

I'm going to ask the standard questions of all of our civilian nominees first, then I'm going to call on Senator Conrad, who is going to introduce Mr. Klotz, and then I'm going to go to the order in which we've indicated on our hearing notice, calling first on you, Ms. James.

First let me start with the questions that I ask all of our civilian nominees.

In order to exercise its jurisdiction, we must receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information; and so, these questions and their answers become very important to us.

Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

[All five witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

[All five witnesses answered in the negative.]

Will you ensure that your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

[All five witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

[All five witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?

[All five witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify, upon request, before this committee?

[All five witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Finally, do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly-constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good-faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

[All five witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Thank you all.

Now let me call on Senator Conrad.

STATEMENT OF HON. KENT CONRAD, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA, RETIRED

Senator CONRAD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I also want to acknowledge the ranking member of the committee, Mr. Inhofe. Thank you very much for this opportunity to introduce General Klotz. I might say that I miss very much our association after retiring.

I want to acknowledge that General Klotz is here with his wife, Nancy, as well as his son, Justin. His son, Justin, actually runs a nursing home, which may have special relevance for me now that I've left the Senate, may have special relevance for some of you who are about to leave.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you for reminding us. [Laughter.]

Senator CONRAD. It is so good to be back with colleagues that I like and respect.

I am here to commend to you General Frank Klotz, somebody that I've known for more than 20 years and have grown to greatly respect.

Frank Klotz is a renaissance man. He's extremely well educated, he has a distinguished service in the military, and he has a remarkable record of accomplishment in the diplomacy of arms control.

Let me just briefly remind you of part of his life story:

In 1973, he graduated with distinction from the U.S. Air Force Academy. He was named a Rhodes Scholar and holds a Ph.D. from Oxford. In 1983, the U.S. Jaycees [U.S. Junior Chamber] named him one of the ten outstanding young men of America. In 1986, he became commander of the Strategic Missile Squadron at Grand Forks Air Force Base in North Dakota. In 1990, he was made the chief of the Nuclear Biological and Chemical Plans Branch at the U.S. Mission to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) in Brussels, Belgium. In 1991, he became commander of the 321st Operations Group at Grand Forks Air Force Base, ND. In 1993, he became director of the Chief of Staff's Operations Group at the U.S. Air Force Headquarters here in Washington. In 1995, he became commander of the 91st Missile Group at Minot Air Force Base, ND.

Notice a pattern, here? [Laughter.]

North Dakota—Grand Forks, ND; Minot, ND.

In 1999, he was our Defense Attache in Moscow. He was the senior U.S. military officer based in Russia. In 2001, he became the Director for Nuclear Policy and Arms Control at the National Security Council in the White House. In that position, he advised the President on all aspects of nuclear weapons policy. He represented the White House in talks leading to the 2002 Moscow Treaty that reduced deployed weapons by two-thirds. As I recall, that treaty passed the Senate on a vote of 95 to 0. Pretty good.

In 2003, he became Commander of the 20th Air Force. In that position, he led 9,500 men and women of our intercontinental ballistic missile forces. In 2005, he became Vice Commander of U.S. Space Command, so he was second in command of over 39,000 men and women. In 2006, he was awarded the General Thomas D. White Trophy for Most Outstanding Contribution to Aerospace. In 2007, he became the Assistant Vice Chief of Staff and Director of the Air Force staff—again, here at headquarters.

In 2009, he became Commander of Global Strike Command at Barksdale Air Force Base in Louisiana. He stood up that command. In that position, he led 23,000 Americans, men and women, and oversaw all nuclear-capable bombers and missiles.

In 2011, he won the prestigious General Larry D. Welch Award for his leadership. In 2011, he became a senior fellow at the Council of Foreign Relations.

This is an uncommon man with a common touch. He is smart, with remarkably good judgment, who has dedicated his life to the defense of our country. I could not be more honored than to recommend to you General Frank Klotz to be Under Secretary of Energy for Nuclear Security. I know of no one more qualified or more prepared for the position than General Frank Klotz.

Thank you very much for this time. It's good to see you all again, and I hope I'll have other chances to see you in the future.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much, Senator Conrad, for a very powerful and heartfelt introduction. We know you have to leave, so please feel free to do that.

Ms. James.

STATEMENT OF HON. DEBORAH LEE JAMES, TO BE SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE

Ms. JAMES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Senator Inhofe, other members of the committee. I am deeply, deeply appreciative of the opportunity to appear before all of you today. I want to also thank Secretary Hagel for his support, as well as President Obama for the confidence that he has placed in me by putting my name forward as the nominee to be the 23rd Secretary of the Air Force.

Needless to say, I view this opportunity as the privilege and an honor of a lifetime. If confirmed, I will work very hard to ensure that I live up to what is an enormous amount of trust that may be placed in me.

I'd also like to take just a moment to say to all of the airmen who may be with us today here in the committee room, or who may be listening from elsewhere—I want to wish them all a very happy 66th birthday. I think I speak, certainly, for all of this panel and all of America to say that we are very proud of our Air Force. I know I am.

I also want to recognize some very important people who are in my life. They're very important to me, personally, and they give me great joy every day. Seated behind me is Frank Beatty, my husband, and three of our four children. With me today is Sam Lee, Regina Lee, and Michelle Beatty. Paul, our fourth child, could not be with us here today. He is in school at George Mason University, and he was not going to cut class. I thought that was a good decision on his part.

Chairman LEVIN. Well, what is the excuse for these kids who are with you, then? [Laughter.]

Ms. JAMES. But, anyway, you guys, thank you so much for being here and supporting me. I love you all very much.

Incidentally, Senators, I would love you to know that Sam and Regina were here with me almost precisely 20 years ago when I first appeared before this committee to be considered as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs. If you take a real good look at them now, I think you will agree with me that they are a whole lot taller and much less squirmy than they were 20 years ago.

I also notice that I have quite a few friends and colleagues who turned out to support me, so a quick shout-out and thanks to Michelle and Tom, Amy, Jim, Mason, Linda, Seileen, Paula, Larry, Louise, Mick, Tom—I have quite a gang back there. Thank you all very much; it means a great deal that you've taken the time to be here.

Senators, I have worked for more than 3 decades as a civilian in support of our military. I've had experience in the executive branch, on Capitol Hill; I've been in the world of think tanks; and I've been in the defense industry. I've also been a volunteer in some of the wonderful nonprofit organizations that help our military, our veterans, and their families in ways that the Government simply cannot.

Specifically, I've served 17 years in the Government and 15 years in the private sector. My prior Government service includes a decade where I served on the staff of the professional staff of the House Armed Services Committee, and then I was 5 years in the Pentagon as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs.

Currently, I'm serving as a member of the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services (DACOWITS), which is an advisory body to the Secretary of Defense on matters affecting our women in uniform. While in the private sector, I've spent the bulk of my time with the company which is my current company, Science Applications International Corporation (SAIC).

I'd like to now come right to the point and give you my bottom line and that is, I'm coming before you today absolutely committed to keeping the U.S. Air Force the very best air force in the world. Now, what does this mean to me? If confirmed, it means that I want to focus on people. As you said, Senator, there's more than 690,000 Active Duty, Reserve, Guard, and civilian airmen who form the backbone of everything that we do. It also means taking on that which will most assuredly be program budget decisions, making tradeoffs, finding the right balance between preserving the Air Force of today and building toward the Air Force of tomorrow. I have no illusions, this is going to be very hard, and we'll need everybody's help to get there from here.

It means ensuring that our Air Force is ready to take on whatever missions our leaders may task, missions to protect us and our interests overseas, as well as missions to protect Americans here at home.

Since virtually all missions nowadays are joint, it also means being an effective partner with the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. Ultimately, here's what it means. This would be my goal, if confirmed, and that would be to leave our Air Force, some years from now, on a path toward greater capability and better affordability for our taxpayers and with the people, who underpin everything, who are second to none. I pledge to you to work on all of these areas very hard, if confirmed.

I'd like to close by thanking the members of this committee, as well as the professional staff, personal staff that I see in the background, because I know that our military would not be the military that it is today had it not been for all of your efforts and all that has happened that has brought us here today.

Thank you, and I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Ms. James.

Secretary Wright.

STATEMENT OF HON. JESSICA GARFOLA WRIGHT, TO BE UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE FOR PERSONNEL AND READINESS

Ms. WRIGHT. Good morning. Chairman Levin, Ranking Member Inhofe, members of the committee, I am humbled to be sitting before you, and I thank you for the opportunity to be here again. I'm very grateful for the confidence that President Obama has placed in me, first to nominate me as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs and now the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness. I want to thank Secretary Hagel and Deputy Secretary Carter for their support of my nomination.

It's been my great honor to serve this Nation, first in uniform, for 35 years, and the last 2-plus years as a civilian with the Department of Defense.

My career in public service would not have been possible without my family. My husband, Chuck, who is here with me today, is my most avid supporter and my champion. He's a combat-tested Army officer who retired with 24 years of service. Our son, Mike, is an Army lieutenant, and he is presently serving in Afghanistan. I have a great pleasure to recognize my mom, Cass. She's here with me today, too. She's the reason that I clearly have grown into an independent woman.

A few days ago, our family buried our dad, John Garfola. My dad served in World War II as a combat medic in the China-Burma-India campaign. He was the role model for my family, and he is my hero.

I've enjoyed the tremendous opportunity of serving as the Acting Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness since January of 2013. In this role, I have the responsibility of advocating for the outstanding men and women of our Active, Guard, and Reserve components, and their families, and the dedicated Department of Defense civilians. It is evident to me that our people, and those that support them, are the Department's greatest asset and their strength.

I fully acknowledge that there are many challenges facing the Department, and the most pressing challenge is the constrained fiscal climate. The Department has two sacred obligations. One is to care for its people, who are willing to sacrifice their lives in order to protect the national interest, and the second is to ensure the national security of the United States. Having had the privilege of wearing our country's uniform for 35 years, I bring a special understanding to both obligations. Our servicemembers and their families selflessly put the interests of our Nation first. Because of the sense of duty, the America's military remains one of the most trusted institutions in our society. If confirmed, I look forward to supporting Secretary Hagel, to ensure that the Department honors both of its obligations, and to sustain an agile, capable force.

One of the most significant challenges we face is the stress on our force as a result of the long, continuous period of armed conflict. For more than a decade, we've repeatedly deployed servicemembers to combat zones, hotspots, and areas of the world that are devastated by natural disaster, separating them from their loved ones for months and years at a time. Although our servicemembers never hesitate to answer the Nation's call, this call causes the toughest challenges on the battlefield and here at home. Our servicemembers and their families are under significant strain. Their minds, their bodies, their spirits require healing. If confirmed, I will ensure that the efforts necessary to provide care for our people are continued.

This year, the Department celebrated the 40th anniversary of the All-Volunteer Force. This force helped win the Cold War, stood against aggression in the Persian Gulf, kept peace in the Balkans, fought in Iraq and Afghanistan. In the next several years, we, as a Nation, will be further challenged by shifting operational requirements abroad, evolving threats to national security, and significant budget challenges. If confirmed, I will be vigilant and ensure the Department provides the leadership and vision necessary to rebalance, adapt, and involve the All-Volunteer Force as it has done so well over the last 40 years. I'm also committed to ensuring that we maintain the military's status as the strongest, most capable, most respected fighting force in the history of the world. I'm grateful to the members of this committee for your continued leadership for the support of our military forces, their families, and the civilian employees of the Department of Defense. If the Senate confirms me for this position, I pledge that I will work diligently with you to best serve the men and women of the Department and their families. I'm deeply honored for this nomination and the potential to continue to serve our Nation.

Thank you, and I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Secretary Wright.

General Klotz.

STATEMENT OF MR. FRANK G. KLOTZ, TO BE UNDER SECRETARY OF ENERGY FOR NUCLEAR SECURITY

Mr. KLOTZ. Thank you, Chairman Levin, Ranking Member Inhofe, distinguished members of this committee. It's a great honor to again appear before the Senate Armed Service Committee. The uniform I'm wearing today may be different this time, but my desire to serve our Nation remains as strong as it ever was. For that reason, I'm enormously grateful to President Obama and Secretary Moniz for their trust and confidence in putting forward my nomination as Under Secretary and Administrator of the NNSA.

I'm also thankful to Senator Kent Conrad for his very generous and gracious introduction. Senator Conrad has been a mentor, a role model, and a dear friend for many years. I had the opportunity to work closely with him on several challenges confronting our Nation's nuclear deterrent forces, and always in a very open and candid and collaborative manner. I like to think that we did some very worthy and noble work together.

I'd also like to thank my wife, Nancy, for her loving and steadfast support, not just today but for the nearly 40 years we shared on Active Duty, including the 29 times that she had to uproot home and family as we moved to new assignments.

Our oldest son, Justin, who lives in Philadelphia and, as you heard—Senator Conrad said, is administrator of a long-term care facility, is also here today. Our youngest son, David, is watching in Boston via webcam.

The spouses and children of those who wear our Nation's uniform serve in countless and often unrecognized ways, and routinely deal with many difficulties and hardships. They, too, deserve our deepest respect and our gratitude for their own invaluable contributions to our country. I'm certainly very proud of my wonderful family and their accomplishments.

I'm also delighted to be joined by my best friend and classmate of the Air Force Academy, the Class of 1973, which, as we speak, is convened out in Colorado Springs for our 40th anniversary. Steve was the first graduate of any Service Academy to become a Catholic priest, and today he is the President of Saint Luke Institute in Silver Spring, MD.

Finally, but certainly not least, Oliver Bloom, who serves as my research associate at the Council on Foreign Relations, is also here. He's a recent graduate of Princeton University but hails from the State of New Hampshire.

The NNSA has a unique and special responsibility for pursuing two different but complementary principles that have traditionally guided American nuclear weapons policy:

The first is that the United States must continue to lead international efforts to limit and reduce nuclear arsenals, combat nuclear proliferation, and secure nuclear materials across the globe.

The second principle is that appropriately sized nuclear forces still play an essential role in protecting U.S. and allied security interests even as we seek to reduce the overall number and role of nuclear weapons in our national security policy. As President Obama and congressional members have repeatedly emphasized: as long as nuclear weapons exist, we must maintain a safe, secure, and effective nuclear arsenal.

If confirmed to be the Under Secretary and the Administrator of the NNSA, my highest priority will be to ensure that the NNSA delivers on the commitments made to Congress and to its many stakeholders in sustaining our nuclear weapons stockpile, both now and in the future, in conducting leading-edge scientific research and preventing nuclear materials from falling into the hands of terrorists and would-be proliferators, in supporting the Navy's nuclear reactor program, in modernizing our facilities to meet the demands of the future, and in protecting the safety and security of our sites, our employees, and the public.

The Military Services often say that people are their most important asset. It's true. It applies to the NNSA, as well. Highly-trained, experienced, and motivated scientists, engineers, technicians, and security personnel are essential to performing the highly complex and technically challenging task associated with the nuclear security enterprise. If confirmed, I will be guided by the principle of "mission first, people always". To this end, I will be an unrelenting champion for the professional development and personal welfare of everyone associated with the NNSA, including recruiting and mentoring the next generation of leaders and scientists.

The NNSA performs enormously important work each and every day. Its many successes go largely unheralded. It has made tremendous progress in helping to achieve the President's goal of securing vulnerable nuclear materials around the globe. It is delivering the life-extended W76–1 warhead to the Navy on schedule and is currently transferring work at the Kansas City plant into a new, modern facility that will greatly improve efficiency. That plant, by the way, has been constructed on time and on budget.

That said, escalating costs in several major programs are a cause for serious concern, especially as pressures mount on overall government spending. Restoring trust in the NNSA's ability to deliver on its commitment requires strong leadership focus on managing cost to deliver capability for less expense. It also requires rebuilding partnerships between the headquarters and the field, between Federal employees and the laboratories and plants, and between the NNSA and Congress and DOD.

In dealing with these priorities, I expect to draw upon recent experience as the first commander of Air Force Global Strike Command. When we established the Command in 2009, our task was to establish clear lines of authority, responsibility, and accountability. We also placed strong emphasis on strengthening the safety and security culture while, at the same time, streamlining processes and eliminating needlessly burdensome non-value-added activities that stood in the way of our people and their incentive to innovate. Finally, we continually stress that everyone in the organization, regardless of job, rank, seniority, was a valued member of the team, and that her or his work was absolutely essential to success. If confirmed, this is the leadership approach I intend to bring to the NNSA.

I, again, thank you for inviting me to appear before this committee today. It truly is an honor. I stand ready to answer any questions you may have now and, if confirmed, to address any questions you or your terrific staffs may have in the future in a very open and candid way.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much, General Klotz.

Mr. Lettre.

STATEMENT OF MR. MARCEL J. LETTRE II, TO BE PRINCIPAL DEPUTY UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE FOR INTELLIGENCE

Mr. LETTRE. Chairman Levin, Senator Inhofe, members of the committee, I'm honored to be with you here this morning as you consider my nomination as Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence.

Let me introduce to the committee, Mr. Chairman, my guests here with me today, to my left and just behind me: my wife, Simmons; my daughters, McKinley, age 11, and Amelia, age 9; my mother, Mary Lettre, a proud Army wife and teacher; and my father, Marcel Lettre, Senior, who is a retired Army colonel, airborne ranger, and Vietnam combat veteran, who, I might add, successfully and quite proudly avoided a Pentagon tour during his 26 years of service. Any opportunities I've had in life are because of this family, this team, and I'm grateful you all could be here today.

I also want to thank several tireless public servants who have served as mentors and colleagues over many years: Senator Harry Reid, Congresswoman Jane Harman, Deputy Secretary Ash Carter, former Under Secretary Michele Flournoy, and Under Secretary Jim Miller, and my good friend, Assistant Secretary of Defense Liz King.

I'm also pleased that a number of other friends and colleagues are in attendance today. Those that I saw include Lieutenant Colonel Ethan Griffin, Dave Muhlbaum, Jason Forrwester, Stuart Irvin, and some others that I probably didn't get a chance to say hello to. Thank you for being here.

I'm deeply humbled that President Obama has nominated me as Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence. Since 2009, I've been honored and privileged to serve three Secretaries of Defense: Chuck Hagel, Leon Panetta, and Bob Gates. If confirmed, I'll be proud to serve Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel and Under Secretary Mike Vickers as they lead the Department of Defense and the Defense Intelligence Community through a critical period of challenge and opportunity. But, most of all, I'll be proud to serve and support the men and women of the U.S. military. Their interests will be my interests, if confirmed.

Mr. Chairman, I believe we're facing the most consequential period for defense intelligence in perhaps a generation. The choices we make now as we draw down from 10 years of war and reshape our enterprise to meet new strategic and budgetary challenges will set us on a multi-decade trajectory for our defense intelligence capabilities. If confirmed, I will keep in mind three major priorities as I support Secretary Hagel, Under Secretary Vickers, and the Defense Intelligence Community:

First, to provide the best intelligence possible to those who are fighting in current operations, operations we're in today and possible contingencies in the near future. The Defense Intelligence Community must maintain its focus on the needs of our deployed men and women, conducting an incredible range of intelligence-driven, precision operations, and the needs of the President and the senior national security team, for the best intelligence possible to address today's threats.

Second, to prepare for a challenging period of budget uncertainty. This will require us to become leaner, to trim overhead, reduce duplication, and shed underperforming activities. It will not be painless or pretty, but we must make tough choices and become stronger and better even as we become smaller.

Third, to push vigorously to innovate and invest. Even as resources fall, we must sharpen the impressive capabilities that keep America's superior technological edge and protect its advantages over its adversaries. That means strengthening capabilities in counterterrorism, cyber security, and countering weapons of mass destruction. We must ensure we maintain global reach and global understanding. These priorities will require a close partnership and strong and regular dialogue between defense intelligence leaders and this committee. I look forward to contributing to that partnership.

We must implement our priorities in defense intelligence while also being ever vigilant about the need for vigorous protection of the principles, rights, and freedoms from which America gains its strength. Those of us privileged to serve in these positions of responsibility recognize that we owe our citizens and our families our full focus and our full energy on keeping the Nation safe and secure.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Mr. Lettre.

Mr. Ohlson.

STATEMENT OF MR. KEVIN A. OHLSON, TO BE A JUDGE OF THE U.S. COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE ARMED SERVICES

Mr. OHLSON. Mr. Chairman, it's a great privilege to appear before this committee as a nominee to be a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. I would like to thank you and the members of this committee for considering me for this important post.

I would also like to thank the President for nominating me for this position. If confirmed, I will do my level best to vindicate his trust.

Of course, I would like to thank my wife, Carolyn, who is here today, behind me to my left, as well as our two children, Matthew and Katherine, who are in school. I would not be sitting here today if it were not for their enduring love and support.

Mr. Chairman, if I am confirmed for a position on the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, I pledge to this committee that I will bring to bear on every case I handle all of my military and criminal justice experiences so that I may be the best judge that I can possibly be. For example, I will be mindful of when I stood shoulder-to-shoulder with some of the finest people I've ever known and rappelled out of helicopters, parachuted out of airplanes, deployed to four foreign countries, and served in the Persian Gulf War. Those experiences taught me indispensable lessons about the men, women, mission, and ethos of our exceptional Armed Forces.

Further, I will be mindful of my service as a trial counsel prosecuting cases at Fort Bragg, as the Article 32 investigating officer in a case involving a serial rapist and murderer who was ultimately sentenced to death, as a Federal prosecutor for many years here in the Nation's capital, and now as the head of the office that punishes prosecutors who have engaged in professional misconduct. These experiences have taught me about the vital importance of the strength, fairness, and integrity of our criminal justice system.

Finally, if I am confirmed, I will be mindful of the men and women in uniform who so proudly and effectively serve our Nation today, such as my nephew, who just returned from a tour of duty as an infantryman in Afghanistan, as well as the many commanders I have known over the years. These experiences have taught me of the importance of striking the right balance between the need to ensure good order and discipline and the need to protect the rights of individual members of our Armed Forces.

In sum, if I am confirmed, I pledge that I will be mindful of all these factors and that I will approach every case with an open mind, guided solely by the facts and the law and by the interests of our U.S. Armed Forces and all those who serve in it.

Thank you for your consideration.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you all.

We'll have a 7-minute first round of questions. We have timers in front of us in this room.

Let me ask you, Mr. Lettre, we've had the adequacy of our security clearance procedures raised, with tragic impact, in recent days. In your new position, if you're confirmed, there's going to be some real responsibility for DOD facility clearances in your job.

The National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2014 that we approved in committee a few months ago requires the Secretary of Defense and the Director of National Intelligence to reform the personnel security clearance investigation, adjudication, and transfer processes to improve security as well as to reduce cost. I'm wondering whether you are familiar with the language in that bill.

Mr. LETTRE. Senator, I'm generally familiar with it. I haven't had a chance to study it or give it deep thought yet.

Chairman LEVIN. All right. Do you have any views on the need for improved security process reform, greater cost transparency in this area?

Mr. LETTRE. I do, Senator. There have been a number of episodes over the last several years that have pointed to a need to take a hard look at our security clearance and security processes. Just this week, as we all know, 12 families are grieving and dealing with a tragedy that occurred at the Washington Navy Yard. Secretary Hagel directed, yesterday, that Deputy Secretary Carter would undertake an immediate review of both facility security, as well as security clearances, as well as standing up an independent panel to look at those issues. I strongly support both of those.

It would be my view, going into the position, if confirmed, Senator, that I would want to take a strong role in doing what I can to be of support to those reviews while also taking into account the direction of the committee to look at those issues as part of the bill. I look forward to doing so.

Chairman LEVIN. All right. Obviously, we thought it was extremely important, even before these recent events, so I think you can take that as a challenge and a charge.

Secretary Wright, you have served in the military for 35 years before retiring as a major general in the Pennsylvania National Guard. I think you're familiar with the major effort which we're making to end sexual assault and sexual harassment, and the provisions that are in our bill as they come to the floor, and the added emphasis that we are placing on ending this scourge. One of the issues that we did not agree upon was the question of transferring responsibility to a prosecutor outside of the chain of command to determine whether or not allegations of sexual assault should be prosecuted. I'm wondering whether you have a view on the role of commanders in changing the military culture in which sexual assaults take place, and also whether we should remove those commanders from the decisionmaking process as to whether or not to charge someone with an offense that would go to a general court-martial.

Ms. WRIGHT. Sir, I do have an opinion. Clearly, the Department has an opinion, and that is to hold the commander——

Chairman LEVIN. You give us your personal opinion, though.

Ms. WRIGHT. My opinion is that the command needs to be clearly involved, and the disposition of the sexual assault needs to stay within the command, which is exactly the same position as the Department's.

Chairman LEVIN. What is the reason for your opinion?

Ms. WRIGHT. Sir, I have served as a commander, and I have also served in the position here as an Acting, and I have worked diligently to expunge sexual assault from our organization. Secretary Hagel has also made this is a top priority of the Department.

The reason I believe it should stay in the command is because the command does have the responsibility for the discipline, the accountability, and the management of their command. Saying that, the commanders also have to be held accountable for what happens in their command.

Secretary Hagel has put a multitude of changes in place that will increase the commanders' accountability. The one thing he has done is, he has raised the disposition authority to a colonel. The second thing he has done is, when a sexual assault occurs and a victim comes forward—it's not a high probability that a victim comes to the commander. The victim normally comes to the sexual assault coordinator, the medic, the chaplain, and then they take it from there, based upon the restricted or unrestricted report.

But, another thing that he has done is, if there is a sexual assault filing within a command, the first general officer in that chain of command must be aware or told that this is happening and to have oversight of what is going on with the case.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Now, Ms. James, you mentioned that you have been on the advisory board for the DACOWITS. I'm wondering if you, there in that position, but also as an Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs in the 1990s, whether you have a view on that question, about whether we should take away from the chain of command that decision as to whether or not to prosecute a sexual assault offense or other offenses.

Ms. JAMES. I do have a view, Senator. My personal view is identical to that of Secretary Wright. I concur that it is extremely important to keep that authority with the commanders, but equally important to hold those commanders accountable for the climate and what goes on in their units. Command is an honor and a privilege in this country; it's not an entitlement. Those who do not live up to our values simply need to be removed from that command.

It has also been my observation, just as someone who has watched the military for my entire professional life—and part of it, at times, as a civilian—is that the military has been extraordinarily effective through the chain of command when there is persistent and constant focus, unrelenting focus. I give you the examples of racial integration and drug use in the Vietnam era. When "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" was repealed, and the implementation of the new rules and expectations, the military chain of command was very, very effective. I think the reason why it hasn't been as effective on this particular matter over the decades is because that consistency of focus has been lacking.

I believe it was Chairman Dempsey who said, before this committee, some months ago at a hearing, that—and I'm paraphrasing—"We took our eye off the ball." I think that means we lost focus. There were wars, there were other things that captured that focus.

If I am fortunate enough to actually get this job and become the Secretary of the Air Force, that will be a top job that I will carry forward, is to keep that focus strong, as it will be for the person who would succeed me. It has to be kept up, and I do believe the chain of command has to be responsible.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much.

Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would ask General Klotz and Mr. Ohlson—you've heard the comments by Secretary Wright and Ms. James concerning the integrity of the role of the commander. Would either of you want to comment on that, or do you agree with them?

Mr. KLOTZ. Senator, I left the military 2½ years ago, so my comments are based on those experiences. I think the fundamental responsibility of the commander is to maintain good order and discipline of her or his organization and enforcement of the UCMJ. Investigating and prosecuting those people who have violated or are suspected of having violated the UCMJ is one of the paramount duties that any commander must have.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, all right, that's a good answer.

Mr. OHLSON. Senator Inhofe, if I were to be confirmed, serving in my role as a judge, it would be my responsibility to apply whatever law all of you come up with. I'm not sure it would be appropriate for me to opine on any specific legislative changes.

Senator INHOFE. That may be true. I have a bias in this area, in having, many, many years ago, served as a court reporter in that system. It never occurred to me, during that time, that the commander would not be supreme in that process.

Secretary Wright, first of all, I appreciate the time you spent with our staff and had a chance to visit. When I first saw the Department of Defense sexual assault survey, I had a lot of things going through my mind. Those of us who are in elective office are pretty familiar with what surveys are, and the integrity of surveys. I looked at that, and when I saw the 26,000 unwanted sexual contacts—the turnout or those who are responding to a survey, are those the ones that actually represent the thinking of the entire population? Do you have any comments to make about that? Because if we're going to do surveys, let's do a better one than we already have behind us. What do you think?

Ms. WRIGHT. First, I will tell you that we do have qualified statisticians that work in the personnel and readiness field that do the surveys. But, saying that, there are a couple of other things that I would like the committee to know.

One, I think our force is about surveyed out. There are at least 400 surveys, I know, that go out to the field, and I'm convinced that there are some that the Department does that don't go through——

Senator INHOFE. Do you know what the response ratio was of this particular survey?

You're saying something I was not aware of, now.

Ms. WRIGHT. No, sir, not off the top of my head. But, I will get back to you what the response was.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, do that.

The 2012 Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members (2012 WGRA) was sent to 108,478 Department of Defense (DOD) Active Duty members and received completed surveys from 22,792 eligible respondents, for an overall weighted response rate of 24 percent. In contrast, the 2010 WGRA was sent to 85,614 DOD Active Duty members and received completed surveys from 24,029 eligible respondents, for a weighted response rate of 31 percent. This does represent a decline in response rates since 2010. While similar declines in response rates have been seen across military surveys, The Defense Manpower Data Center continues to obtain some of the highest response rates for surveys on military populations. Despite this, the response rate obtained in the 2012 WGRA does not diminish the statistical accuracy of the survey estimates.

Ms. WRIGHT. Also, I know the surveys go out in an email force portion. So, if you get three surveys that day, and two of them don't apply to you, and one does, and you have a few minutes, you're going to do the one that applies to you.

Senator INHOFE. Okay, that's a good answer. That did answer the question that I have. I think that does kind of single out individuals.

One of the statements you had made—and this is a quote—is, "The Department's policy is to treat all military personnel equally and to make the same benefits available to all qualified members." That was a quote by you. The memorandum then goes on to authorize the administrative absence of servicemembers, offering a different opportunity for same-sex marriage as other marriage. Is that an inconsistency, or where are you on that?

Ms. WRIGHT. I believe, sir, you're referring to the 4 September memo where I talk about, if you're going to get married, and you are not able to get married with a 100-mile radius, that the command can grant you an administrative absence to a place where you can get married, and that would apply to both same-sex couples and heterosexual couples.

Senator INHOFE. Yes.

Ms. WRIGHT. I will be very honest with you. The times that it would apply to heterosexual couples will be probably few and far between. But, in a meeting that the Secretary called—he was away, he revisited the policy when he was away, he called me, and the next day that he got back, he called a meeting with the Service Chiefs and with the Service Secretaries and with the Chairman, and we discussed this, and we discussed this at great lengths. He believes—they believe—we developed that policy then, and they believe that the policy is fair and equitable to all. Granted that there is a slimmer possibility for a heterosexual couple to run up against this issue.

Senator INHOFE. That is the perception.

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes.

Senator INHOFE. I don't want to spend any more time on that issue, because we're running out of time, here.

Ms. James, I think we should give serious consideration to having a Senate Strategic Choices and Management Review hearing. I think a lot came from that, where we're trying to get a hearing from the Chiefs as to how the sequestration's going to directly affect them. We might give some consideration to have a similar hearing here in the Senate.

Ms. James, General Welsh made this statement yesterday, saying, "The damage will be insidious, but, should we face a high-end threat in the future, the impact of not modernizing will be blatant and deadly. While failing to achieve national objectives in the next counterinsurgency fight would be distressing, losing a major full-spectrum fight would be catastrophic."

Are you sure you want to get into this? There are some real problems. Having a background and knowing a little bit about flying airplanes, back on April 9, when they made the decision to ground—approximately 16 squadrons, is it your agreement with some I have talked to and who have testified here that the cost savings of that 2- or 3-month period were not—it's going to cost a lot more than the savings that they achieve from that. Have you given any thought to that?

Ms. JAMES. My understanding, Senator, is, digging out from under the readiness hole, if you will, actually will cost us more money than had we funded it the way it was originally intended to be funded from the beginning. Yes, I agree with that, and I would like to concur with the spirit of what you're saying. I, too, am troubled by the readiness profile. Of course, hard decisions had to be made. As some of you have already pointed out, combat fighter squadrons were not able to fly for a period of time, depot maintenance was deferred, there were many civilians furloughed. It's very troubling that those actions had to be taken, and I am hopeful, still, though it is sometimes discouraging to wake up and read your morning newspaper, that there can be some agreement reached so that the entirety of our Government can get beyond sequestration and that we can get to some figure for spending, albeit a lesser figure—we know we all have to be much more affordable for our taxpayers—but to know what that figure will be so that we can execute and we can plan to a single number and have a certain degree of certainty. That is my hope.

Senator INHOFE. I appreciate it.

My time has expired, but I'm going to send a question for the record, General Klotz, concerning the B–61 and the difference in treatment between the House position and our position. I'm inclined to agree more with the House. I have some questions I'd like to send for the record to both of you who we didn't get a chance to visit.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Inhofe.

Senator Reed.

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank all of the nominees, not only for their willingness to serve, but their already distinguished public service. Thank you all very much.

Secretary Wright, one of the areas that is directly under your responsibility is the cost of all the personnel programs, and not just pay and wages, but also, particularly, TRICARE and other benefits. Every year, in the last few years, the Secretary has sent over some suggestions, along with the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. Sometimes we follow them, many times we don't. But, the question still looms out there: As this costs increase as a percentage of your budget going forward, it gets larger and larger each year, cutting back, in terms of operations, training, maintenance, investment in new technologies. Just a very general question is, one, I presume this is going to be one of your highest priorities, to try to deal with these issues of accelerating costs, and, two, how do you propose to go about setting up a constructive dialogue with all the stakeholders—Active, retires, beneficiaries, the people that have to train, plan, and deploy the forces? Can you comment on those two points?

Ms. WRIGHT. In reference to TRICARE, sir?

Senator REED. TRICARE and other issues under the personnel costs. The generic sort of issue of the personnel costs.

Ms. WRIGHT. Oftentimes—and we have done this already three times since I have been in the acting role—the Veteran Service Organizations (VSO) and the Military Service Organizations (MSO)—and our family council that we have—is a venue that I use to get the word out about what we're doing in the Department. I have met with the VSOs three times since I have been the acting, and that is a very good venue to relate the changes that we're doing and also the issues that we're facing, and to hear them out about their issues and the things that we want the Department to do.

On the family side of the house, we have a Military Family Readiness Council that is made up of the Services, but it's also made up of spouses and members of all components. I use that as another venue.

We also use public affairs—George Little and I work diligently together to get our message out, no matter what the issue is within personnel and readiness, of the change of policy.

Senator REED. Can I just follow up on a quick point? I appreciate those efforts, and they're designed to communicate what you propose to do. But, there's another level here, and that is trying to build a consensus upon changes that have to be at least accepted or tolerated by many of the different groups. Are you in the active consensus-building or simply saying, "This is what we're proposing?"

Ms. WRIGHT. Sir, sometimes we have to direct things to happen.

Senator REED. I understand that.

Ms. WRIGHT. But, it's much easier to direct something to happen if you have explained why you're doing it and you take their opinions and see if you can mitigate some of the concerns that they have as you are writing the policy. That is what we do.

The meetings with all of these people are not me being dictatorial in nature and flowing one way. I am gathering their opinion, because they're really the boots on the ground out in the population that we serve.

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Madam Secretary.

Mr. Lettre, you will be Principal Deputy to the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence, and obviously this issue of contracting, with respect to intelligence services, has come up, with huge implications—Mr. Snowden, and now the tragedy at the Washington Navy Yard. The first question is that the concept of contractors is the purest—is that they do things in the military are not essentially military. A lot of the intelligence efforts are, really, military. Is there any thought that you've given and advice you're prepared to give with respect to redefining what roles would be appropriate for intelligence contractors versus what roles will be necessary to be filled by direct employees—military, civilian, or the Government?

Mr. LETTRE. Senator, the role of contractors, particularly in the Intelligence Community, but also across the Department, is something that the leadership team needs to put a lot of focus on in the next couple of years as we go through budget uncertainty and the budget trajectory that we're looking at.

Within the Intelligence Community, there are jobs performed by Active Duty military, jobs by career civilians, and then by contractors. I do think there are instances where contractors bring in quite unique capabilities, from a technology and an innovation perspective, that make it hard to see us being able to get that capability through any other way than through a contractor, because of the rapid-changing nature of technology.

I think in the Intelligence Community, one of the guiding principles we need to look at all of the use of contractors through as we work our way through this in the next year or 2 is exactly that: How can we ensure that anything that can only be uniquely done through a nongovernmental sector or expertise is really driving our use of contractors? As we make tough choices about how to deal with the budget challenges of the next couple of years, we keep that principle in mind.

Senator REED. Let me follow up. These incidents have also raised the issue of how we screen these contractors, to speak generally. It raises a question, one, who is responsible for what? Is it purely the responsibility of the Department of Defense to ensure the reliability and the stability of the contractor, or are the companies that employ these individuals responsible, contractually or otherwise? It would seem to me that both cases should apply, but it also seems to me, now, there's some confusion as to who really is the ultimate validator of the reliability, competence, and dependability of these individuals who have access to secrets and to facilities. Can you comment very briefly?

Mr. LETTRE. Senator, I do think it's time to take another look at the accountability of contractors and the executives who lead contracting firms in the private sector with respect to the responsibilities they may have on security clearances. Secretary Hagel's announcement, yesterday, that he's directing Deputy Secretary Carter to take a look at security clearances, as well as establishing an independent panel to look at this issue, I think provides a good opportunity to do that.

Senator REED. Thank you all very much, and, again, thank you for your service to the Nation, and good luck.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Reed.

Senator Wicker.

Senator WICKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, ladies and gentlemen.

Ms. James, we had a great visit last week. Thank you for that. At that meeting, I briefly mentioned my concerns regarding the concept and implementation of the Air Force's Total Force Plan (TFP). As I mentioned to Secretary Donley and General Welsh during the Air Force posture hearing earlier this year, I believe that some elements of the TFP were shortsighted and may adversely impact our intra-theater airlift capability at a time when our Services are evolving toward more rotational deployment model. As ranking member of the Airland Subcommittee, I am very pleased that your answers to our committee's advance policy questions acknowledge that the decisions made last year regarding the TFP were made without adequate consultation of the various stakeholders who are now feeling the negative impacts of the plan's implementation. Ms. James, this is a very important answer, and I appreciate your acknowledging that fact.

Let me just ask you, there will be a national commission on the structure of the Air Force. It's scheduled to report back to Congress with findings and recommendations next year. Would the Air Force, under your leadership, consider modifications to the TFP based on the commission's findings and recommendations?

Ms. JAMES. Senator, if I may begin by saying, based on my time, both on the committee staff on the House side as well as when I served as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs, I'm a deep, deep believer in the value of the total force. I would just like to say that up front.

I would also like to say that, in some ways, it's painful to me to see some of the frictions that have been happening between the air components. Back in the 1990s, I used to refer to the air components, with respect to their utilization of the Guard and Reserve, as the superstars of the Guard and Reserve, and I still think that's so. But, clearly, there are fences to be mended, and we need to do some work here.

I absolutely welcome the work of the commission. I'm fortunate that I consider myself to be a good friend of some of the commissioners. I know General McCarthy, I know Ms. Conaton. I know several of them. I think we'll have a good working relationship. I look forward to hearing their ideas. Again, if I am confirmed into this job, I would like to think a hallmark of what I will bring to the table will be very close consultations, bringing in all of the components, talking to adjutants generals, talking to Members of Congress, and trying to come up with a go-forward proposal which will basically meet the country's needs as well as the States' needs for the very real desirability of being able to respond when disaster strikes.

With that said, I'm equally sure that we will have to take reductions. We've talked about this budget situation that we're facing, so it won't be easy. But, we need everybody's input and best efforts, and that will certainly be what I will work toward.

Senator WICKER. Thank you. Should the committee recommend modifications, you would consider those recommendations?

Ms. JAMES. I'm completely openminded and will welcome their report.

Senator WICKER. Thank you. If confirmed, will you commit to working with our committee to ensure that future Air Force manning and force-structure decisions are fully considered within the broader national strategic context?

Ms. JAMES. I do give you that commitment.

Senator WICKER. Thank you. As we discussed last week, I'm very proud of all of our installations in Mississippi. I particularly would call to your attention Keesler Air Force Base, which won the Air Force Installation Excellence Award, the leading Air Force Base in the entire Air Force.

I'm committed to ensuring that Keesler, which is a training base, maintain a flying mission. If confirmed, will you work with me to ensure that Keesler maintains an enduring flying mission?

Ms. JAMES. What I know of Keesler is all topnotch, and I look forward to visiting Keesler—with you, I hope.

Senator WICKER. Very soon, perhaps.

Ms. JAMES. You said perhaps that we should do that, could do that, so I welcome that opportunity.

Senator WICKER. Thank you very much.

Now, let me shift, then, Ms. James, to unmanned aerial systems (UAS), such as the very successful RQ–4 Global Hawk. These UASs are providing critical support to deployed forces around the world.

Combatant commanders continue to stress the importance of intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR), and have identified ISR shortfalls in key areas around the world. Many, if not all, members of the committee view UAVs as "the" cost-effective future of airborne ISR.

In Mississippi, we not only have the Global Hawk, but we have the Orion UAS. Orion just completed its first test flight last month at China Lake. It is designed to stay aloft for up to 5 days while carrying a 1,000-pound payload of sensors. If confirmed, I urge you and your team to be briefed on what I consider to be a very promising program in the Air Force.

What is your assessment of the potential for long-endurance unmanned systems to help meet combatant commander ISR requirements? If confirmed, would you provide to this committee, say, within 30 days, a briefing and written report of the Air Force's investment strategy to provide unmanned long-endurance airborne ISR capability to our combatant commanders?

Ms. JAMES. First, Senator, I would say yes, I certainly will get back to you in 30 days after confirmation, if I am confirmed, to give you my best assessment that I can after that 30-day period, even if it may be incomplete still at that juncture.

Senator WICKER. Thank you.

Ms. JAMES. I do recall our discussion about Orion, and I would very much welcome learning more about that in a briefing.

As to the overall issue of unmanned systems versus manned systems, I have some familiarity with that. It's an area that I need to look into and study more deeply to understand the costs and benefits of both. My initial take is that we certainly need both in our force. We need a complement of both, and we need to ensure that we're looking at costs and capability and survivability. Because my understanding is, it's somewhat different, depending on which system you're looking at.

But, it's an important area, and I believe in it, and I will look into it further.

Senator WICKER. Thank you. Let me just ask, real briefly, about the common support helicopter to replace our aging UH–1N fleet. As reflected in our committee-reported text, the 2014 DOD authorization bill, this committee believes that the UH–1N is critical to the nuclear security and continuity-of-government missions, and can be achieved by leveraging existing DOD production capacity.

I would commend to you, Ms. James, and to you, General Klotz, the American Eurocopter Global Strike aircraft. If confirmed, will you provide to this committee and my office, within 30 days, a briefing and written answers to the questions of, why is the Air Force not funding a UH–1N replacement program, when the Air Force states that protection of the U.S. nuclear enterprise is a top priority? How will the Air Force and the NNSA ensure that resource allocations accurately reflect our stated commitment to protect the U.S. nuclear enterprise?

Ms. James?

Ms. JAMES. Yes, I will absolutely come back to you in 30 days and give you my best answer to that, Senator.

Senator WICKER. Thank you.

General Klotz?

Mr. KLOTZ. Senator, I will, as well.
Chairman LEVIN. Okay?
Senator WICKER. Thank you very much.
Thanks for your indulgence, Mr. Chairman.
Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Wicker.
Senator McCaskill.
Senator MCCASKILL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

One of the distressing things that has occurred in the honest disagreement and debate around how we work on the problem of sexual assault in the military is a narrative that has developed, unfortunately, that somehow this is about whose side you're taking, the victims or the commanders. I want to try to clarify that that is not an accurate description of discussions in the policy changes that are being debated. Rather, this is an honest disagreement over which reforms will better protect the victims and which reforms will result in more prosecutions.

I hope I have time to get back to some of the additional work we want to do. You all are aware of the body of work that Senator Gillibrand and I, together, have accomplished in this bill, along with the help of a lot of others, including the Chairman, that are going to remove commanders from in any way having authority to change the outcome of a military trial. You're aware of the fact that all victims, like the Air Force has role-modeled, are going to have their own lawyers. I won't go through all the changes we've made.

The Chairman and I continue to work on ways that we can hold the commanders accountable. If I get time to get back to that, I would like you to give, now or later, your specific recommendations on how we can hold commanders accountable for this important problem that they have to get after.

Also Article 32 and reforms that I think need to occur within Article 32. It became a weird amalgamation of a preliminary hearing, discovery, trial-run trial, it's evolved of this just over the last decade, and would like your input on that.

But, I really want to focus now on the two problems that we're all trying to get at, and that's retaliation and reporting. I know you all are aware that all of our allies that have removed commanders entirely from this decision have not seen an increase in reporting. None of them have. We know that is not the key, just doing that, in terms of increasing reporting. We know that they do not have to report to the commanders now, and they certainly won't over the reforms that are embedded in the NDAA that is going to be debated on the floor.

But, retaliation is one I would like you to address. Any of you—and if you have had experience as a JAG, and, Secretary Wright, as you've had experience as a commander—I'm trying to assess, if a victim is going back into a unit, when is the likelihood of retaliation higher, when a JAG lawyer a half a continent away has signed off on pursuing charges or when the commander of that unit has signed off, in terms of pursuing charges? Which would create an environment that would be more likely for there to be retaliation?

Secretary Wright?

Ms. WRIGHT. Ma'am, honestly, at first blush, I couldn't tell you. What I can tell you is, the victim can ask for—if the victim files an unrestricted report, and it is public—even with a restricted report—they can ask for a transfer out of that particular unit. That is one right that we have for the victim. We even now if the alleged perpetrator is in that unit, we can transfer the alleged perpetrator out of the unit.

Retaliation is real. I agree with you 100 percent. Maybe not in every case, but if it's in one case, that's one too many. I believe what we need to work at, and I think that our commanders, from Secretary Hagel on down, is working at, is what I call "social courage". I put it into the aspect that, if you're in combat with someone, and your battle buddy in combat is doing something that will get you killed, you immediately will say something to that person, no matter what. You won't think about it twice.

If you are in a social situation with that same person, and that person is either drinking too much or not acting up to the values that our system wants you to act up to, and looks like something may go sour, if you will, with someone else, that social courage is there to say to that person, "Let's go home. You're drinking too much, you're being foolish."

I think that our commanders, our people, our lowest grades of enlisted, need to learn that social courage to hold that them, themselves, responsible and also hold their battle buddy responsible.

It's prosecution, and it's also holding people responsible for their actions.

Senator MCCASKILL. Ms. James, I know that there have been a number of changes already enacted in the Air Force—is there anything about a lawyer making a decision to go forward that would provide an extra level of protection, as opposed to a commander deciding to go forward?

Ms. JAMES. I, personally, don't think so. I, if I may, wanted to offer up the core, I think, of your question is, we have to instill more confidence in members of the force, that if they are victimized, we want them to come forward.

Senator MCCASKILL. Correct.

Ms. JAMES. We want them to report. All reports are good, but unrestricted reports are better, because then followup can occur.

Based on my DACOWITS experience—and DACOWITS does installation visits, we do focus groups with men and women—the sampling of people that I have talked to, some of whom have been victims, others of whom know those who have been victims—they tell me they don't come forward for a number of reasons. They feel personally ashamed, they feel that they may be blamed for what has happened. They do fear retaliation, sometimes from chain of command, sometimes from their buddies in the unit, and they just simply don't want people to know, and they're not sure that anything will be done, or at least not enough will be done.

I agree with Secretary Wright, to have the option of either transferring the alleged perpetrator or transferring the victim, to be able to go either way with that, I think, is a good thing.

I'd like to offer a specific couple of ideas. These are ideas that the DACOWITS has recommended. It goes to the issue of accountability of commanders. I believe, from every job I have ever held, either in government or in the private sector, that aligning a person's incentives and looking at what they are measured on, getting all of that into alignment, is terribly, terribly important.

The DACOWITS has recommended that it be put into the performance reviews of commanders how well or poorly they are doing in the area of the climate within their unit, and how well or poorly they are doing with respect to being a leader against sexual harassment. To the degree that each and every commander understands that his or her career is on the line to do well in this regard, people pay attention to what they're measured on. That is one idea.

Senator MCCASKILL. I thank you for that. I know my time is up, but I would look to all of you, and especially, Mr. Lettre, with your experiences as doing Article 32s and—did you say that you were one of the investigators—did I hear that in your introductory remarks? Or was that you, Mr. Ohlson?

Mr. OHLSON. Actually, that was me, Senator.

Senator MCCASKILL. Oh, well, you can't do this, then, because of the position you're nominated to. Thank goodness, though, we have civilian courts of appeals now that will be the sole arbiter of whether or not due process has been achieved within the UCMJ, instead of having these weird situation where judges could overturn jury verdicts. I'm glad that that is definitely going to get fixed.

But, any specific ideas you have about Article 32 and how we can make some reforms there.

I would mention, as I close, Mr. Chairman, that we have given victims the choice of expressing that they would prefer the charges to be done in the civilian system. Once again, giving the victim more power, empowering the victims so they do not feel like that they are being swept up in a system that nothing's going to happen and they have no control over. That also is part of our reform that I think is essential.

I thank you all and look forward to your specific suggestions.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Two quick comments on that.

One is, for the first time, retaliation is a crime, if we can get our bill passed, because, in our bill, we would make retaliation a crime, for the first time.

Second, that suggestion of DACOWITS, about the performance review containing a review of a commander who's being reviewed as to the climate in that command, is now, by a number of us, being looked at for inclusion in our bill, when it gets to the floor, as an amendment. There's a number of us who have looked at that recommendation and feel that it's a very important recommendation, and are working on language so that it can be incorporated, hopefully, in our bill when we get to the floor.

Senator Blunt is next.

Thank you, Senator McCaskill.

Senator Blunt.

Senator BLUNT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ms. James, I didn't get a chance to visit with you before today, and I'm assuming that's probably my fault, but I look forward to talking to you more as this process goes on. I just have a couple of questions, basically, their future asset and equipment questions. We have Whiteman Air Force Base in the State that Senator McCaskill and I represent, and clearly important in our overall strategy.

The only new aircraft, I believe, out there is the long-range stealth bomber that's being considered right now. Obviously, that's an important part of our projection, maybe an important platform that other equipment can look to, to be built around. But, are you concerned that, in the decade in front of us, that's the only plane we're talking about right now as a new addition to the Air Force?

Ms. JAMES. Senator Blunt, there's really three top modernization programs that are very important to the Air Force. One is the F–35, the other is the new tanker, and the third, as you said, is the new long-range bomber. Of the three, the new long-range bomber is in the earliest phases of development.

Senator BLUNT. Right. That's what I meant, the one that is the newest thing we're launching. There's nothing that follows that in the line of talking about new—well, go ahead.

Ms. JAMES. As far as I know, those are the three top priorities. Based on what I know about those three top priorities, it seems right to me—based on the strategy that we are pursuing, based on the thrust of the rebalance toward the Pacific. You need longer range, we need more bomber forces. It's important for the triad, and so forth. These seem like the correct programs, to me, at this point.

Senator BLUNT. Now, as those are being developed, there's some discussion, of course, of taking some of the workhorse equipment, like the A–10s, and just totally eliminating entire groups of planes as we look at the money available. I think when General Welch was up here, before the House Armed Services Committee, he said that the Air Force may be forced to eliminate entire fleets that have less relevance in contested airspace, including the A–10. This would be one of the planes—I don't know, until we have something that fully meets that need, we can make that decision. That's a decision that eventually would come up to you. Do you have anything to say about that?

Ms. JAMES. I do. I am not privy to any of the predecisional work, at this point, but, as you point out, I, too, have read accounts that everything essentially is on the table. I don't know specifically about that, but I read it in my morning newspaper, as well, that this was commented upon yesterday by the chief. My understanding is that these are part of the hard decisions that are being looked at as options, but that there are no final decisions.

I do agree with you, though; if we're going to eliminate an entire aircraft which is currently serving a particular mission, we'd better be sure that we have something else that will serve that mission in the interim until one of the futuristic programs comes online.

These are all areas that I will need to delve into much more deeply if I'm confirmed, but I think this points out some of the very difficult challenges that we're going to have to work through together of how to make ends meet with the budget figures that we may be faced with.

Senator BLUNT. All right. It's going to be a big job, and these questions will get to your desk, assuming you're at that desk. I believe you will be. But, thanks for those answers.

General Klotz, we talked yesterday about the NNSA facility in Kansas City. You mentioned it again today. I think one of the things you're going to have to deal with there is, What do you do with the property that you're leaving that goes back to World War II airplane production? Do you want to get some thoughts on how that move is going to occur, when it'll be finished, and then what happens to the property that you leave behind?

Mr. KLOTZ. Yes, Senator. The move into the new facility is currently underway and will very soon be completed, and it is an exciting facility that will not only reduce the overall footprint, or the amount of space, it takes to do the work that's been done at the Kansas City plant, but will do it much more efficiently.

You're right, there will be a facility that we will be vacating, along with the General Services Administration (GSA), in the same location on Bannister Road. The Kansas City plant has been a part of the nuclear weapons enterprise for decades. The NNSA and the people who work in the Kansas City plant consider themselves part of the social fabric of that part of the State of Missouri. As I committed to you when we met, we will be good stewards in making sure that facility is turned over as quickly as possible so that it can be reused by the citizens who live in that particular part of the State.

Senator BLUNT. Yes. Not to comment on, but just for me to say, I think, at some point, those two pieces of property that really are part of the same complex are going to, in order to allow something to happen there, probably one of the two of you needs to become the lead agency and the controlling agency. I think that'll be an early decision that you may be asked to make, whether you want to be the lead agency or whether you want the GSA to be.

I don't believe you had a chance to comment on Senator Reed's question about contractors. One, are there a lot of contractors? Two, after these recent incidents that we've seen with contractors—Edward Snowden and now the contractor at the Navy Yard—what are your thoughts about the necessity of contractors and how to better deal with this overall issue?

Mr. KLOTZ. Senator, the NNSA relies extensively on contractors, and has for a number of years. There are roughly 1,800 Federal employees in the NNSA, but there are nearly 30,000 contractor employees that work in the National Security Laboratories, in the plants, and on various other facilities, doing on it a Government-owned contractor-operated basis. They are indispensable, integral members of the team, in terms of delivering the product and the capabilities that the NNSA has to have.

The security, particularly personal security and cyber security, is an extraordinarily serious concern with respect to the NNSA, given the very sensitive nature of the information it handles, as well as the intellectual material that it also must deal with.

I have said, on several occasions, that security and safety are going to be my top priorities, if confirmed, and we need to take a very close look, given the events of the past few months, whether it's a failure in terms of security of individuals or failures in terms of securing facilities, to ensure that we have the right organization and the right tools to protect against any breaches of security.

Senator BLUNT. Okay, thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Blunt.

Senator Hagan.

Senator HAGAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank all of you for being here and for your commitment to public service. I know that your individual commitment to public service means your families, also. I want to certainly welcome the families that are behind you today.

I want to follow it up on Senator McCaskill's question on sexual assault, Ms. James. In your response to questions from the committee regarding sexual assault, you stated that, "Senior military and civilian leaders, beginning with the Secretary and Air staff, must focus on promoting an environment that does not tolerate sexual assault." Obviously. We appreciate that. But, you are aware that, twice in the past 6 months, uniformed military officials, whose job it was to prevent sexual assault, were arrested for committing sexual assault, themselves, including the head of the Air Force's program. The screening process in this area certainly needs to be discussed.

If confirmed, how do you intend to ensure that the best-qualified and appropriately screened individuals are placed in these positions and billets, not only at the top, but within all levels of the Department?

Ms. JAMES. With respect to the people who are serving in those very critical positions for the area of sexual assault, I will look forward to reviewing what the current criteria is for selection and training and so forth. I have not delved into that particular aspect deeply at this juncture.

Senator HAGAN. Obviously, it's a critical position.

Let me talk about pivoting to the Pacific, as far as the military. In the fall of 2011, the administration outlined a long-term strategy for expanding our role in the Asia-Pacific region. There's been some speculation that this pivot would require a shift of some military assets from the east to the west coast.

Ms. James, from your understanding of the President's initiatives, do you believe that the Air Force will need to physically shift assets to support the strategy? Would such a shift perhaps leave us less ready to respond to contingencies outside of the Asia-Pacific region, or even in parts of the United States?

Ms. JAMES. On that latter point, I certainly hope not, and it would be part of my job to ensure that that was not the case. That is, in terms of leaving other parts of the world or other parts of the country at greater risk. I certainly would not wish to see that happen, and I would be an advocate to not let that happen.

In terms of the overall strategy of rebalance to the Pacific—of course, we're military witnesses, we talk about a great deal about the military programs, but it really is comprehensive—it's economic, it's diplomatic, it's military, it's all of that, that our Government would be focused on for that rebalance. I think that's a recognition of the importance of the Pacific, economically and from a threat perspective, and so forth.

We'll have to be looking at all of that, and I certainly will do that, on behalf of the Air Force, if confirmed.

Senator HAGAN. This committee's markup of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2014 prohibits authorization of a future Base Realignment and Closure round until, at the very least, DOD completes and submits to Congress a formal review of the overseas military facilities structure. The committee is signaling, and I firmly believe, that the Department does need to prioritize domestic military bases over foreign bases, especially when you look at the fiscally constrained environment that we're in.

Once again, Ms. James, and the last question for you, what are your thoughts on this issue? Do you agree that we should continue to take a hard look at our overseas military facilities before considering looking at similar actions back home?

Ms. JAMES. I do agree we need to take a very strong look at the overseas bases, and I believe that that review is ongoing. I'll have to look into the due date of that review, but that is happening.

With respect to the overall base-closure issue, I will say that I have been briefed and I do believe that there is excess capacity in all of the Military Services. I believe the Air Force has put that excess capacity at about 20 to 24 percent.

Senator HAGAN. Does that include overseas, or are you talking now just specifically on U.S. soil?

Ms. JAMES. I believe that is the entirety, U.S. Air Force bases worldwide. As you point out, the overseas piece is important, and that part is getting a very big scrub at this point.

But, I do believe it's part and parcel of our being able to reduce overhead functions, consolidate facilities, free up money so that we can plow that money back into other resources over time. I do think it is something that we need, and we need to reduce infrastructure as best as possible across the board.

Senator HAGAN. Tell me that number one more time, you said 24 percent?

Ms. JAMES. I believe it's between 20 and 24 percent excess capacity that the Air Force has talked about.

Senator HAGAN. Oh.

Secretary Wright, the Department of Defense and the defense industry are facing challenges seeking new graduates with advanced degrees in scientific and technical fields to help develop the complex military systems. Some of these challenges include a lack of interest in traditional defense sectors by our new graduates: Federal hiring issues, budget pressure, the length that typical defense programs take to execute, and then, obviously, the competition for talent with other, not only government agencies, but the corporate sector, too. If confirmed, what would you do to ensure that the Department of Defense has access to the best and the brightest future scientific and technical talent? How would you measure the effectiveness of these efforts?

Ms. WRIGHT. Ma'am, part of the issue that we're dealing right now is, with the budgetary constraints that we're under, we are under a hiring freeze. There is, in the Department, the ability to waive some of those very important positions, and some of them would fall in the categories that you just talked about.

It is our responsibility to screen the applicants, and it's our responsibility to kind of market the positions that we have to make sure that we get the best applicants to apply.

The Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math (STEM) program starts from the bottom up and works from the bottom up for people to realize how important science, technology, engineering, and math is. That's a program that I think is worth its weight in gold as we continue to move people through the system, through graduate degrees and applications in to the Department of Defense.

Senator HAGAN. I think we can all understand that we're not doing enough in the STEM fields in our public education schools around the country now, and I think we have to have a greater emphasis, especially beginning in middle school. It seems we lose many of the young girls in middle school.

But, this is a critical problem, and, I think, from corporate America to the national security issues, that the individuals that we must have in DOD, that we really take a very keen and strong interest to be sure that we are competing worldwide for this talent. I know how important it is, from the national security aspect, that we do get the best and the brightest, and that we keep them. I think that's an issue that I know you'll be giving it a lot of study and action.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Hagan.

Senator Ayotte.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank all of you for being here, and your families, for your service to our country, and for the important positions you're about to take on.

Ms. James, you and I had a chance to meet the other day and talk in person, and first of all, I want to reiterate what I told you, which is, I look forward to working with you on the basing of the KC–46A tanker at Pease Air Force Base. We're very proud of the work done by our 157th Refueling Unit. I look forward to being a partner with you on that. As we mentioned in our meeting, Senator Shaheen and I would love to have you up to New Hampshire to see that unit and also to see what is a great association between an Active Duty and a Guard unit, which I think, is a model for the country. Thank you, and I look forward to working with you on that.

I wanted to also follow up in the discussion we had—I know that Senator Blunt had asked you about the A–10s, and you said that there had not yet been a decision on A–10s. One of the concerns that I have is, I was given a slide, I believe, that came from Air Combat Command, that actually says that the A–10 fleet would be divested by fiscal year 2015, on this slide. Why that makes me concerned is that there already has been a decision made on the A–10. As you and I talked about in our meeting, the A–10 has a very important function, in terms of close air support. In fact, most recently in July, 60 soldiers were saved in Afghanistan because of the important close air support provided by the A–10.

I'm going to submit this article for the record. I hope that you will look at that.

Bagram Pilots Save 60 Soldiers in Convoy Ambush

Aug 06, 2013

Air Force News| by Staff Sgt. Stephenie Wade

BAGRAM AIRFIELD, Afghanistan -- Two A-10 Thunderbolt II pilots assigned to the 74th Expeditionary Fighter Squadron, provided close-air support to 60 U.S. Soldiers July 24.

The Soldiers were part of a routine clearance patrol that was ambushed after their lead vehicle in a convoy of 12 turned over during a patrol of an Afghanistan highway. The situation forced the Soldiers to establish an overnight base while they pulled the vehicle out of a ravine. As the sun rose, the unit began to receive heavy fire from a nearby tree line. The members were pinned behind their vehicles and three of the Soldiers suffered injuries. The unit was under fire and the wounded members needed a casualty evacuation so they called for close-air support.

However, there was one problem; the ground unit didn't have a way to confirm the enemy's position. The unit did have a joint fire observer who was able to communicate an estimated location to the A-10 pilots who arrived on scene shortly after receiving the call from a local base's joint terminal air controller responsible for coordinating aerial engagements.

"I flew over to provide a show of force while my wingman was looking for gunfire below," said the flight lead of the two-ship A-10 mission. "Our goal with the show of force was to break the contact and let the enemy know we were there, but they didn't stop. I think that day the enemy knew they were going to die, so they pushed even harder and began moving closer to our ground forces."

When the enemy combatants didn't flee after the show of force, the A-10 pilots decided to deliver air-to-surface munitions to protect the friendly ground forces.

"Even with all our (top-of-the-line) tools today, we still rely on visual references," said the lead pilot, who is on his first deployment from Moody Air Force Base, Ga. "Once we received general location of the enemy's position, I rolled in as lead aircraft and fired two rockets to mark the area with smoke. Then my wingman rolled in to shoot the enemy with his 30 millimeter rounds."

According to the pilots, that really stirred up the attacking force. The enemy moved even closer to the friendlies in an attempt to prevent the A-10 from attacking again. The ground forces were now taking on a large amount of fire from the trees and surrounding high terrain.

"We just kept putting down more 30 mm rounds," said the second A-10 pilot, also deployed from Moody AFB. "The bad guys were closing in and according to the muzzle flashes there were a lot of them, but because people were shooting all over the place, the JTAC didn't feel safe bringing in helicopters in to evacuate the wounded personnel."

The pilots said usually after the first or second pass, the enemy runs away, but this enemy force was large and willing to fight. The pilots continued to fire 30 mm rounds, but the enemy force refused to fall back. Now, the enemy force was close enough to engage the unit with grenades, so the convoy's commander approved the pilots to engage "danger-close." The term is meant to clearly communicate to the ground and air forces that the need for support is so grave the ground commander is willing to accept the potential risk to the friendly unit for the life-saving employment from the air.

"We train for this, but shooting danger-close is uncomfortable, because now the friendlies are at risk," the second A-10 pilot said. "We came in for a low-angle strafe, 75 feet above the enemy's position and used the 30-mm gun -- 50 meters parallel to ground forces -- ensuring our fire was accurate so we didn't hurt the friendlies.

The engagement lasted two hours that day, and in that time, the A-10s completed 15 gun passes, fired nearly all their 2,300, 30-mm rounds, and dropped three 500-pound bombs on the enemy force.

"That last gun runs must have made them give up," the two pilots agreed "because the firing stopped."

Shortly after the engagement was complete, an MC-12 aircraft specializing in intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance arrived and began scanning the area for enemy forces that might be regrouping. Sometimes when close-air support leaves, enemy forces will attack again, so the A-10s remained on-station until all the Soldiers were safe.

"We wanted to make sure the area was safe because we had the pararescuemen from the 83rd Expeditionary Rescue Squadron coming to transport the injured to Bagram's hospital," said the second pilot. "The flight doctor assigned to our squadron treated the wounded in the emergency room. It was an example of a successful mission with contributions from all assets of our base."

After the pilots landed and debriefed, they went to the hospital to see the wounded Soldier.

"He was laying there and next to him was a picture of his high-school girlfriend," the lead pilot said. "We were glad knowing we helped get him home alive. He said, 'Thank you for shooting those bad guys'. Luckily we were only a few minutes away and all the friendlies made it out that day."

Providing close-air support is the squadron's main mission here, and is the specialty of the aircraft they fly, the A-10 Thunderbolt II nicknamed the "Warthog."

"This was one of the most intense sorties our squadron has come into contact with in the last four months in theater," the lead pilot said. "Afterward the Afghan National Army said they found 18 enemy dead, so I can only imagine how many were out there. This was close-air support and this is what we train for."

Senator AYOTTE. I will ask you again: To your knowledge, has there been any decision made to divest the A–10? Because I'm not sure why these types of slides would be put out there by Air Combat Command if this decision hadn't already been made.

Ms. JAMES. Senator, first of all, I, too, look forward to visiting Pease and working with you on the base, the KC–46, and all of the other important issues that you and I talked about.

To the best of my knowledge, there is no decision on divesting A–10s or anything else, for that matter, because all of this is predecisional. However, it is my belief that planners and people who are looking at budget and possible scenarios are looking at options, and everything, including complete divestitures of aircraft fleet, these things are possibilities, they are on the table.

Senator AYOTTE. One of the issues that you and I talked about which I think is very important—I'm certainly a strong supporter of the F–35 and our fifth-generation fighter, but, until the F–35 is operational, we can't be giving up our capacity, particularly important capacity that protects our troops. What I would ask for you, as a nominee of this important position, will you agree to come and speak to Congress and brief us when the decisions are made, if there is a decision made to divest from the A–10 or any other airframe, so that we can weigh in on this important decision? Then we'll have the opportunity, of course, to ask you questions and for us to have a very important dialogue about this on all of the airframes.

Ms. JAMES. Yes, I will.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, I appreciate that.

I appreciated the meeting that we had, Mr. Klotz, in terms of the important positions that you've held for our country. One of the issues that is very important to me is the modernization of our nuclear deterrent. Certainly as part of the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), many of the individuals—I wasn't here at the time—who agreed to endorse that treaty were very concerned about modernizing our nuclear deterrent.

In your position, when you're confirmed, will you be an advocate for making sure that we modernize our nuclear deterrent? How important do you believe that is, to make sure that we have a strong triad?

Mr. KLOTZ. Senator, I think it's absolutely essential that we modernize and extend the life and maintain the nuclear weapons that are currently in our arsenal for a triad of forces. We currently have the oldest stockpile, in terms of average age, that we've ever had as a Nation, and there needs to be scientific work and an awful lot of touch labor to ensure that those nuclear weapons that we retain are still fully safe, fully secure, and fully effective.

I will be an ardent champion for getting the resources, whether that's funding or people or facilities in our laboratories and in our plants, in order to carry out that most important mission, and hopefully will be persuasive with the administration and with the committees of Congress.

Senator AYOTTE. I appreciate that very much.

I also wanted to follow up, based on your prior experience in the important positions that you've held in the past that are so critical to our nuclear deterrent, you and I talked about this—there's been some discussion of the potential for further reducing our nuclear deterrent. Certainly, the President has given some speeches that suggest that that may be a possibility. Would you recommend that we do that unilaterally?

Mr. KLOTZ. Senator, my view has always been, throughout my military career, that the best way to pursue any sort of arms control agreement is part of a negotiated treaty.

Senator AYOTTE. A treaty that would come before Congress so that Congress could weigh in on this important issue?

Mr. KLOTZ. Yes, Senator, a treaty that would come before the Senate for consent to ratification.

Senator AYOTTE. Absolutely. I appreciate that, and I think that's important, that we weigh in on it, but also that, if there's going to be any further efforts to reduce our nuclear arsenal, that certainly it not be done unilaterally, particularly with what we see happening right now around the world with some of the individuals and rogue actors who are also seeking to have their own nuclear capability. I appreciate that. You're taking on a very important position for the Nation. Thank you for your prior experience in this area, as well.

I want to thank all of you for being here.

Let me just reiterate, Mr. Lettre, that I very much look forward to the important work that I know that you are going to do in reviewing the security clearances. All of us on this committee are very troubled by what appears to be some significant lapses, in terms of a contractor getting access who had a fairly significant history of misconduct and other flags that worry us, in terms of the security clearances of our contractors and the safety of our personnel. I look forward to working with you on that, and this is a very important review that I know that you'll be a big part of. Thank you.

Mr. LETTRE. Thank you, Senator. I look forward to working with the committee on that.

Senator AYOTTE. Great.

Thank you all.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

Senator Donnelly.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to give my sympathies, and that of everyone in Indiana, to the families and victims of those killed and injured at the Navy Yard. We owe a debt of gratitude to these patriots for their work on behalf of the United States and for sacrificing their lives in the service of our country.

To all the members of our panel, we want to thank you for the sacrifice you have made, and to your families for everything you have done for this Nation.

Secretary Wright, I thank you for taking the time for visiting with me earlier in this week to discuss the importance identifying servicemembers and veterans in need of mental health care. I have introduced the Jacob Saxton Military Suicide Prevention Act, and it seeks to improve identification of servicemembers at risk, and creates a career-long mental health history to help professionals provide the best possible care.

I just want to make sure of your commitment to work forward on this legislation, and to really dig deep in this area to make sure that we can end this scourge.

Ms. WRIGHT. Sir, you have my full commitment. It is not only the Department's job, but to work hand-in-glove with Congress and, truly, everyone. It's everyone's responsibility to work towards solving the suicide problem.

Senator DONNELLY. You've heard questions from my colleagues about the A–10s and about the Reserve Force. In fiscal year 2013, the Air Force submitted a budget in which 17 percent of the cuts came from the Active component, despite the fact that 67 percent of Air Force personnel is the Active component. We went through, in Indiana, as many of my colleagues have, a situation where we were providing services at 28 cents on the dollar, and were notified that there was going to be an effort to try to remove all of those services from what we were doing.

What we're looking for is, for want of a better way of putting it, a fair shake, that when a judgment is made, it is made on the numbers, it is made on who can provide the best service at the lowest cost. Obviously, I'm talking in reference to the Air Guard and others. I'm wondering what efforts you have undertaken and what you will do to ensure that DOD finds a balance between the Active Duty and the Air Guard.

Ms. WRIGHT. Sir, we are in on all the meetings that discuss the force structure as it relates to the budget and the balance and the mission prosecution that we have to do. Not only my office, but also the office that falls within my purview as in Reserve Affairs.

One of the other things that the Secretary has done is, he meets with the Council of Governors that represents the National Guard and, in turn, represents the Reserve components—the title 10 Reserve components within their State, and he has assured them that we will be transparent in what we decide to do, and he has personally met with them, and the Deputy has met with them, for the balance of the Reserve components, as it applies to the force structure and how we structure both the Reserve and the Active.

Senator DONNELLY. Ms. James, I'd like to hear your thoughts on this, as well.

Ms. JAMES. I certainly concur with what Ms. Wright just explained. I hope I, too, will get to meet with the Council of Governors. I think this kind of crosstalk is important, work with Members of Congress, and, very importantly, pull in the Guard, the Reserve, along with the Active, to include some of the adjutants general, so that we can put together a go-forward plan, which makes sense, both from the standpoint of the national mission that the Air Force has as well as responding when disaster strikes here at home. Both are very important.

Senator DONNELLY. I can tell you that, before, when this happened, it basically was just dropped in our laps and told us, "This is what's going to happen," and, "Good luck with it." Obviously, we were not willing to sit still for that kind of thing.

What I would like to also see, and I know my other colleagues have asked you this, as well, so you're going to have an active travel schedule, but we'd love to have you both come to Indiana and see the quality of the installations that we have so when you make these judgments, that you're not just making it from a piece of paper, but you're making it from actual knowledge of what you're looking at.

Ms. WRIGHT. I would love to, sir.

Ms. JAMES. Me, too.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you very much.

Mr.—and I apologize, I wasn't here at the start—"LaTray"?

Mr. LETTRE. "Leh'-truh," Senator.

Senator DONNELLY. "Leh'-truh," okay. I didn't know how French you are——[Laughter.]

Senator DONNELLY. Something of very significant concern to me is counterfeit microelectronics. A lot of work is done in our State, at Crane, on that. But, I think they're a troubling problem for the military supply chain. The committee has done a very comprehensive investigation of this, but one of the difficulties we face is in identifying manufacturing facilities or foundries that produce the counterfeit parts and then put them into the DOD supply chain. I'm wondering what efforts, that you can talk about here, that the Intelligence Community has taken to gather information on this, because one of our fighter planes is only as good as its worst part that is in the plane. I'd be interested in your comments on that.

Mr. LETTRE. Senator, the sourcing of counterfeit microelectronic parts and our intelligence assessments on that is not something I've had a chance to really dig deeply into. If confirmed, I would like to do so. I'm familiar with the committee's work on counterfeit parts over the last couple of years. It's been a serious contribution to shedding light on this important security risk. What I would like to do is continue the dialogue with the committee to make sure that we are putting the right capabilities to bear within the Intelligence Community to address this challenge.

Senator DONNELLY. Okay. Any efforts and emphasis you can put on this, I think, is critical to our national security.

Mr. Klotz, I was wondering what efforts you can talk to us about in regards to the partnering, for instance, that's undertaken at Crane between the Air Force and the Navy to reduce recapitalization costs as it modernizes strategic ballistic systems, working to make sure we have a stronger nuclear effort. How important do you think that is to be able to combine efforts, not only cost-saving, but also possibly having a stronger product, a stronger result, at the end of the day?

Mr. KLOTZ. Senator, I think that all options ought to be on the table, particularly as we begin the process of modernizing the warheads which are associated with both the Air Force and the Navy. I am aware that considerable work is already being done under the auspices of the Nuclear Weapons Council, which combines the efforts of both the Department of Defense and the Department of Energy and between the Air Force and the Navy, looking for ways in which they can achieve greater commonality and, in the process, perhaps make for more efficient use of our facilities and, at the same time, reduce costs of the life extension program.

I think this is an area which is ripe for a lot of work.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Just to follow up on the commitment you made, Mr. Lettre, to Senator Donnelly on the counterfeit parts. The law, as we wrote it, has certain requirements. First of all, it holds the contractors responsible for replacing parts. It can't be passed along to the Government to pay for those replacements. Second, we require that the parts have to be purchased from the original manufacturer. We're talking, here, about these microelectronic parts, but it applies broadly. You have to buy it from the original manufacturer or their certified suppliers and representatives or trusted vendors.

Now, there's an effort being made to weaken this provision. It has been, the provision that Senator Donnelly is referring to that we wrote into the law. We're going to need you to tell us, in the next—within a month after you're confirmed—as to whether or not those provisions in our law to address this issue are being implemented. As part of your response to Senator Donnelly's question for the record, we'd appreciate that.

Mr. LETTRE. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Lee.

Senator LEE. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Thanks, to all of you, for being here today.

Ms. James, why don't we start with you. Thank you, first of all, for stopping by my office earlier this week. I enjoyed our visit a great deal.

I want to follow up on some of the conversations that we had. First, let's talk about the F–35 for a minute. I think the acquisition of this system, of this aircraft, is really important for the Nation's security and for the Air Force. I know that I and a lot of other people are looking forward to seeing it roll out. It has, of course, been a project that has been plagued with a lot of cost overruns and schedule delays. These things do happen, especially with a big long-term project, a very complex weapon system like this one. But, I'm really afraid that it could threaten the program, especially during a time like this, where we're dealing with a lot of really thorny budgetary issues. Those things tend to make everything much worse in this kind of economic climate than they might otherwise.

Can you just give me your assessment of where we are with this program, and what you could do, if confirmed, to make sure that everything proceeds as smoothly as possible within the cost parameters and the timeframes contemplated?

Ms. JAMES. Senator, this is, of course, one of the top three most important modernization programs that the U.S. Air Force has today. It's critical that we maintain the air superiority and the capability that we have had for the last 50 years. This particular program is an integral part of all of that.

First of all, one thing I'll do, if confirmed, is, I'll continue to advocate for this program, the importance of it, and be a spokesman for the fact that the threats out there are real and that we need this program to help us counter those threats.

As far as the cost growth, the schedule slips and whatnot, I agree with you, it's been a long time, it's an enormously expensive program, and we owe the taxpayers our very best.

What I know so far about recent times with this program is that things are trending in the right direction. That is to say that the program manager, General Bogdan, has reported that the costs are coming down. Can more be done? I hope so. I don't know yet. But, it's at least trending in the right direction. We're starting to come up on some important, I'll call it, "developmental decisions," I think, particularly software. There's a software decision that will have to be made soon. Software is critically important. It can make or break a program. Ensuring that that is done correctly is another important facet.

If confirmed, in addition to advocating for this program, I will do my best, from my perspective as the Secretary of the Air Force, to work with the Under Secretary for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics, to work with the program manager of the program, and with the Secretary of Defense, to make sure that we give value back to the taxpayer, that we watch those costs, that we birddog it every single day, have dialogue with industry—that's another important thing that's been happening lately—so that industry takes on its fair share of the risk, going forward.

Senator LEE. Thank you. Following up on that, with the F–35—we talked a little bit the other day about the F–35 basing decision; specifically, the record of decision pertaining to basing of the F–35 OPS–1. As I mentioned the other day, I was disappointed in the multiple delays in the decision. I was told, in January, that we would have a decision by March. Then I was told, a month or 2 after that, that we would have a decision either sometime this summer or, at the latest, I was told, by October. Recently, there was some indication that it might not happen in October.

I was encouraged to hear General Welsh state, yesterday, that we can still expect a decision sometime this fall. It still makes me a little bit nervous. There's still a fair amount of wiggle room in that.

Can you just tell me, as best you understand of the situation, what the reason is for the multiple delays and when, specifically, you anticipate the record of decision might be announced?

Ms. JAMES. I, too, Senator, believe that it is the fall, so that's October-November timeframe, I would say. That's based on my best understanding.

I don't know why there have been so many delays, other than, of course, it is a complex decision, there's input from a variety of sources, a lot of data has to be reviewed. But, I know it's been a frustration, and I hope it won't be too much longer.

Senator LEE. Okay. Thank you. Given your experience both within Government and outside of government, this does have all kinds of ramifications, especially for the warfighter community, as a result of the uncertainty all of this creates. I'm also worried about all of the related decisions, the military construction actions that have to be taken, all of which turn on the record of decision issuing, with regard to the basing decision.

My time's running short. Let's turn to General Klotz. Thank you, as well, for coming by my office recently. I enjoyed my visit with you, as well, General.

Congress continues to have some serious concerns with regard to cost growth and delays, as well as planning issues, at the NNSA. I assume you're familiar with the recent Government Accountability Office report that said that the NNSA has $16 billion in cost overruns across 10 major projects, and that that could result in a combined 38-year backlog. I assume you don't intend to be in this job for 38 years. But, a Member of Congress should never accuse an agency of doing that, because, by some measures, we're more like 1,000 or 1,500 years behind what we need to do in Congress. I just want to ask: If confirmed, how will you address some of these issues related to backlog and cost overrun?

Mr. KLOTZ. Senator, I, too, have read a number of different reports that have been written over the past 10–12 years that have taken to task the NNSA for shortcomings in program management, cost estimation, and large capital construction. I've been encouraged, as I have been preparing for the possibility of being confirmed, to learn that some significant steps have been taken in the past year or so, and since Secretary Moniz has been confirmed and entered into office as the Secretary of Energy, that are designed to enhance the internal skills of the NNSA to do cost estimation and program management, to include bringing in a lot of people who have had experience in the past with large capital construction, say, in the Navy or with the Corps of Engineers, into its own workforce.

There have also been efforts to work more closely with the Department of Defense, particularly in the area of cost estimation, to share best practices and to get an independent review of what the NNSA is anticipating will be the case with costs and as well as the scope of what the Department of Defense expects, in terms of its own requirements and the requirements of our military.

My objective will be to continue this process that has begun, to drill down even further into the processes by which we do cost estimation, project managing, and capital construction, to ensure that all alternatives are laid out and carefully vetted, and that we hold both Federal employees and contractors responsible and ensure that there are clear lines of authority and responsibility for them doing their task.

Senator LEE. Thank you very much. Thanks, to all of you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Lee.

Senator King.

Senator KING. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'd like to address a general question to—I guess it would be the right side of the panel: Ms. Wright, Ms. James, and Mr. Klotz.

Is the budgetary chaos around here threatening the national security of the United States?

Ms. James?

Ms. JAMES. I think it's a very, very serious concern. If I may echo something I said earlier, it is extremely time-consuming and unsettling to be executing the way that we are executing. We're not making as good a judgments as we otherwise could if we had a fixed number to work with and the flexibility to implement. That's number one: execution is not what it could or should be.

Then, trying to plan for the future is incredibly difficult and enormously time-consuming when you are trying to plan for different scenarios.

To get beyond this point, to come to an agreement for the entirety of our Government, which I would hope could lift sequestration, give each of our Departments a new number—I'll speak for the Air Force; I hope to be able to speak for the Air Force—we would like to know what we are really executing for and planning for, and have a greater degree of certainty than what has been the case.

Senator KING. Ms. Wright?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, sir, I will add to what Ms. James has said. Frankly, yesterday, the Service Chiefs testified, and, really, what they said was that they all voiced their grave concern over the readiness of our force, based upon the sequestration, the potential Continuing Resolution (CR), and the budget, that we——

Senator KING. Does that make the answer to my question "yes"?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, sir, it does. We clearly focus on those individuals that we are sending into harm's way. We make sure they're trained, we make sure they're the best-equipped, and that they have what they need. But, we have a very unready force, because of the sequestration that we have just gone through, and because of the potential sequestration and the CR in 2014.

Senator KING. "An unready force" is a term that should strike fear into everyone that is listening to us today and everyone in this enterprise around here. "An unready force."

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, sir. Readiness is just not training; readiness is equipment modernization, readiness is equipment repair, readiness is collective and individual training, readiness is personnel risk reduction—the suicides, the family programs. That whole ball of readiness is affected because of the uncertainty of the budget.

Senator KING. Lack of readiness, lack of training, lack of all those things that you just listed, put American lives at risk, do they not?

Ms. WRIGHT. I would agree. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. General Klotz, you've been in this business for a long time. Have you ever seen anything like what we're in right now?

Mr. KLOTZ. No, Senator, I don't believe I have, except perhaps for the immediate years after the end of the Vietnam war, when there was a significant drawdown; there was a lot of pressure.

I would concur with what my two colleagues said. I also think there is an important personal dimension to that; and that is, the civilian employees of the Department of Defense, who are stalwart patriots and have given, in many cases, their entire adult lives to serving our Nation through service as civilian employees. To the extent that they were adversely affected, both in terms of the number of days they had to take furlough, but, more importantly, the hit that they took in terms of their morale and sense of importance to the mission, I think is something that we ought to bend over backwards never to repeat again, and to continuously remind them of the extraordinary contribution that they and their families make to the Department of Defense and to our national security.

Senator KING. Would you concur that the current chaos threatens national security?

Mr. KLOTZ. It certainly makes it extraordinarily difficult for those people who are responsible for carrying it out to do the work that they need to do, whether it's operations and maintenance day-to-day on a flight line, or whether it's developing the plans and programs that are going to position our Services and the NNSA for contributing to the national security in the future.

Senator KING. I think, Ms. James, you said something very important, and that is, it's not only the number, it's the uncertainty; it's the not knowing what the number is. I used to be in business. If we know what the rules are, you can manage to those rules. If the rules are unclear or change or uncertain, that's as much of a problem as whatever the number turns out to be.

Ms. JAMES. Absolutely, Senator. In direct answer to your question, I think this current uncertainty and, as you said, chaos does threaten our national security, because, again, I will say what I believe about the Air Force. We have the best air force in the world, and I have complete confidence in them that they will step up to the plate and do whatever we ask of them. But, in situations where you have not been able to put the resources into readiness that otherwise should have been put, it means that there's increased risk.

Senator KING. I think what's going on around here is an insult to the word "chaos". Chaos is too mild a term.

Ms. Wright, one quick, not really a question, but a suggestion. A lot of effort is put into recruiting people into the armed services; not as much effort, in my judgment, is put into helping them get out. We have a huge problem, in Maine and across the country, of veterans who are unable to navigate the system, the kind of outplacement counseling, if you will, that would be equivalent to the recruiting. I hope you'll pay some attention to that. I know that there are programs, but I think that's a place where we can improve, because the system is complex. A young man or young woman leaves the Service at the age of 22 or 23, how to navigate that and the interplay with the Veterans Administration, I hope is something you'll pay some close attention to.

Ms. WRIGHT. Sir, may I answer?

Senator KING. Yes, ma'am.

Ms. WRIGHT. We've worked diligently on it, and I agree with you, that is something that we really needed to do. We have 206 transition sites across the Nation where servicemembers are required to go through a Transition Assistance Program. As they go through that program, we have married up with the Department of Labor and Department of Veterans Affairs (VA), to the point where we make the servicemembers fill out—it's mandatory that they fill out a financial sheet so we know what their finances will be when they transition, we know if they have an education, we know if they have a job lined up. If they are in that at-risk category of not having those things that would create a livelihood, the Veterans Affairs community does a warm handoff.

The example of that is, if they get out at Fort Hood, but they're going back to Maine, we do a warm handoff to the veterans community that is in Maine, so they can get the benefits that they have worked hard for and that they deserve.

We have started this program, and we are in the process of making very positive changes, and have, now, some classes that will be effective, 1 October, for them to be involved with, should they need to learn how to write a resume, should they need to get a job. Again, sir, we're doing it with the Department of Labor and VA.

Senator KING. Excellent, thank you very much.

I know I'm out of time, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to submit a question for the record to Mr. Lettre involving better coordination between the military intelligence and the rest of the Intelligence Community. We're spending $75 billion in 2012 on intelligence, over $20 billion in the military, over $50 billion in the rest of the Intelligence Community. I would hope that there will be opportunities for working together, cooperation, coordination, and maybe saving a little of that money.

I'll submit the question for the record.

Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator King.

Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I thank the witnesses.

Ms. James, I share your concern, and that of the other witnesses, about the chaos that my friend and colleague from Maine just pointed out. It makes it a little harder for me to make that argument when the F–35 is now the first trillion-dollar weapon system in history, a consistent series of cost overruns that have made it worse than a disgrace. It's hard for me, when a aircraft carrier, the USS Gerald R. Ford, is $2 billion over the estimated cost, and no end in sight.

I keep hearing that we have reduced the F–35, and the next batch we have will have significant controls. It's still one of the great national scandals that we have ever had, as far as the expenditure of taxpayers' dollars are concerned.

I hope that you will stay on top of these cost overruns. They're throughout the Services, and I can tell you, my constituents, when they hear about the fact that the F–35 has consistently, over many years, exceeded any cost estimate that was ever begun, it's a little hard for me to get the kind of support and concern that the Senator from Maine and I share. It is still not under control.

I'm sure you know, we still have not had an audit of the Department of Defense. Yet, time after time, we mandate it here in our Defense authorizations bills, and yet, that audit is never able to be completed. The American people at least deserve an audit of what the U.S. military is doing.

Now, I want to say, one of your major tasks, as has probably already been mentioned in the hearing—I'm sorry I had to bounce back and forth—is the whole issue of sexual assaults. Can this committee have confidence that this is one of your highest priorities and that you can come to this committee and present to all of us a plan and a policy that will put this issue on a sharp decline and lead to a renewed confidence in the American people that young women who join the U.S. Air Force will have confidence that they will not be subject to a sexual assault?

Ms. JAMES. This will be one of my top priorities. I intend to work on it very, very hard, and I absolutely welcome the opportunity for that.

Senator MCCAIN. Got any ideas?

Ms. JAMES. One I put forth, and the Chairman says that you all are actively considering it, and that is to hold commanders more accountable, to include in their performance assessments a measure of the climate within their unit and how well they're doing. Because, sir, being a commander, it's not an entitlement, it's an honor and a privilege; and if they're not living up to the measure, they need to go. That is an idea that the DACOWITS has put forth, and I'm a member of that DACOWITS, so I offered that up as one suggestion.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you. There was a time in the military where we had severe racial problems, and we embarked on a very long and exhaustive period of indoctrination of the men and women who were serving in the military. Not only that, that if there was racism exhibited, the punishment was swift and sure. That has to be part of any program that you will propose in order to cure this terrible situation which dishonors all of us.

Ms. JAMES. I absolutely agree with you.

Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Wright, in 2010, then-Defense Secretary Robert Gates said the Pentagon needed to cut staff sizes. He made this part of his efficiency initiatives. That was August 9, 2010. In 2010, the Joint Staff was 1,286 people. That was in 2010. Now we have 4,244 in 2012, a 230-percent increase. Now Secretary Hagel, I understand, is ordering a 20-percent cut in uniform and civilian personnel, officers on military command staffs. Now, where's the credibility, here, Secretary Wright?

Ms. WRIGHT. Sir, I will tell you that Secretary Hagel was very serious about cutting 20 percent of his force.

Senator MCCAIN. What's your plan?

Ms. WRIGHT. What is my personal plan for personnel and readiness?

Senator MCCAIN. What will be your plan—not your personal plan—what will be the plan that will be implemented by the Department of Defense to achieve the 20-percent cut that Secretary Hagel is advocating?

Ms. WRIGHT. Each one in the Department has the responsibility to turn in to the Deputy Secretary, Secretary Carter, an understanding and specific methods of where we are cutting. The cut comes from dollars, so we have a dollar account, it will be cut 20 percent, and we will match full-time equivalents, we will match military to that cut, by name, of positions that we will cut that will equal 20 percent. In our other items, in our travel account, in our other accounts——

Senator MCCAIN. What would be the time target for when this 20-percent cut would be completed?

Ms. WRIGHT. Sir, I have to give Secretary Carter, by the end of the month, this 20-percent cut. I believe the 20-percent cut will go into effect 2015 to 2019.

Senator MCCAIN. We can plan on this taking until 2019 to enact a 20-percent cut in a increase that is a 230-percent increase between 2010 and 2012?

Ms. WRIGHT. Sir, I would like to get back to you on the specific timeline. I don't want to say something that is incorrect, so I will make sure——

Senator MCCAIN. You're waiting until 2019 before completing a 20-percent cut. That is totally unsatisfactory, Madam Secretary. What I would like to hear from you is a plan and a date certain for when this plan would be executed. If there's skepticism on the part of members of this committee, it goes back to 2010, when the Secretary of Defense said that there would be a 20-percent cut; in fact, we have had a dramatic increase. The Joint Staff is just one small example. I can show you—U.S. Africa Command, 15-percent increase; U.S. Central Command, 19-percent increase; the Office of the Secretary of Defense, 9.5. Not a single decrease has taken place in any of the major commands. One of the great charades, of course, was when the Joint Forces Command in Norfolk was closed; they just shifted everybody over to another command. That wasn't reduction in staffs, that was a movement in staffs.

I would appreciate it if you would submit to this committee a plan that we can count on that doesn't take until 2019 to implement.

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, sir, I understand.

The Secretary of Defense recently directed a 20 percent reduction in funding for certain headquarters (HQ) activities (Office of the Secretary of Defense, Joint Staff, Service Secretariats, and military staffs, and most 3/4-star commands). This HQ reduction is to be taken in addition to civilian reductions already reflected in the fiscal year 2014 President's budget. This 20 percent HQ reduction will be implemented beginning in fiscal year 2015 and completed by fiscal year 2019; it will be reflected in the Department's submission to the fiscal year 2015 President's budget.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator McCain.

Senator Vitter.

Senator VITTER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thanks to all of the nominees, for your commitment to service.

Ms. James, I have a question for you. A lot of us are very concerned about what, in our opinion, is political correctness run amuck on steroids, quashing legitimate exercise and expression of religion in the military. Things like: not quashing active proselytizing, but telling somebody they can't have a Bible on their desk; that's a documented case. Telling a Christian chaplain he can't end a prayer, "In Jesus' name": that's a documented case.

Do you think these sort of issues are a problem? If so, what would you do about it?

Ms. JAMES. Senator, actually, Senator Lee talked to me about this, as well.

Senator VITTER. I apologize. I wasn't here.

Ms. JAMES. No, no, I mean in the office call.

Senator VITTER. Yes.

Ms. JAMES. I've heard about this in the last few days. Here's what I know. I have actually read the policy of the Department of Defense, and I know what that policy says. It says that the open ability to worship, there shall be freedom of all religions, as long as within good order and discipline. I know that the chaplains, the whole point that they put forth is that there shall be dignity and respect for everyone in the force.

He mentioned the same point that you mentioned—I'm not familiar with those cases. Of course, it's a question of—you have a policy, the policy seems good, to me, but then you have some people who don't follow the policy. These individual cases, we'll have to look into.

Senator VITTER. To take my two examples, let's say they're hypotheticals, not specific cases. Do you think those actions should be barred in the military?

Ms. JAMES. Having a Bible on your desk? That doesn't seem like it should be barred, to me, no.

Senator VITTER. A Christian chaplain ending a prayer, "In Christ's name"?

Ms. JAMES. It does not seem bad, to me, and if you'll allow me to consult with the Chaplaincy Corps to find out if there is some reason I'm not thinking about—but, no, it certainly does not trouble me.

Senator VITTER. Okay. We're going to give you about 42 specific examples as a followup, and I'd really urge you to look into these, because many of us, a majority on this committee, according to a vote we had recently, think this is a real issue. Thank you.

Mr. Klotz, I just have a couple of questions for you. I appreciate your experience with Global Strike Command, and I think that's very valuable. I am concerned that DOD may be weighing some major realignment and the possible restructuring of smaller commands, like Global Strike. Have you seen anything to indicate that current or future threats would not require the benefits of a strong Global Strike Command?

Mr. KLOTZ. Senator, I have to admit a fair degree of bias on this issue, as one of the individuals who helped stand up that command, and had the great privilege and honor of being the first commander. The reason we stood up the command in the first place was, at the end of the Cold War, we had divested responsibility for the Air Force's nuclear delivery systems between two different commands, commands which had an extraordinary workload and were not able to provide dedicated, focused attention to the nuclear enterprise. As a result of that, we lost focus.

As I indicated earlier, we're going to have nuclear weapons for a very long time. They must be safe, secure, and effective, and it requires focused, dedicated leadership to ensuring that is being done. That is the role of Air Force Global Strike Command.

Senator VITTER. Great, thank you.

Also, as part of the discussions about the New START treaty, the President made a very specific commitment to modernize or replace our strategic triad, and a specific dollar commitment. Unfortunately, that dollar commitment has not come close to being met, where he, in his proposals, is at least a third short. Is that a problem for our nuclear structure?

Mr. KLOTZ. If confirmed, Senator, my role will be to be the principal advocate for taking those steps that are necessary to ensure that the stockpile that we have is, as I said, safe, secure, and effective, and that we're taking all the steps, in terms of modernizing and extending the life of the nuclear weapons that we currently have.

I will certainly be a champion for every dollar, every person, every capability with a facility to make that happen, and hopefully, as I said earlier, will be persuasive with other agencies of the administration, as well as with committees of Congress, in making that case.

Senator VITTER. Great. Again, just for the record, I want to underscore—this was a clear commitment made as part of the New START treaty passage through the Senate discussions, and it just hasn't been kept. There are no big surprises. Everybody who was part of that discussion knew the budget climate. That isn't something that came up in the last 6 months; everybody knew it was a tough budget climate. But, the commitment was made for these dollars for modernization, which is essential to keep the nuclear arms we do retain safe and effective as a deterrent. We're 34 percent short of that. That really, really concerns me. I urge you to help rectify that.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Vitter.

On one of the questions which Senator Vitter raised about the allegation that somebody was not allowed to have a Bible on their desk, we've tried to get that information, and it's important that it be found so that it can be corrected if it's accurate. Ms. James, as part of your commitment to Senator Vitter, I hope that, on that one, in particular, you would see if you can identify the event and see what action was taken to correct it, because we've had difficulty confirming it. That doesn't mean it didn't happen; our staff has been unable to get that done.

In terms of the reference to, in a prayer, I think, depending on where a prayer is made—if it's made to a general audience, it could be a different responsibility on a chaplain than if it's made to an audience of his own religion, for instance. But, this is a very sensitive area, because we want to protect freedom of religion for chaplains and for our troops, but we also want to protect the freedom of religion for people who are listening to chaplains.

Ms. JAMES. Right.

Chairman LEVIN. It's a very serious subject which has been raised, and it's deserving of all of our attentions. It's gotten a lot of attention from some of us. Hopefully you'll look into the issue that Senator Vitter has raised in his—I think he said there'll be—what?—40 examples or 42 examples. If you'll get back to the full committee on what you find in that regard, we would appreciate it.

Ms. JAMES. I absolutely will, Senator.

Senator Vitter, if you have a specific example, please, give it to me, and I will ask the Air Force, as well, for information.

With respect to the other point, Senator, I totally agree with you that something that may or may not be troubling to me, personally, may be to others, and the idea of dignity and respect for all religions, to include those who have no religion at all, it's all equally important. I agree with you very much.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

While I am unfamiliar with the specific cases you have cited, to my knowledge there is no Air Force Instruction or policy prohibiting military members from displaying a Bible on their desk. Additionally, for Federal employees, the U.S. Equal Opportunity Commission Compliance Manual explicitly allows for the display of religious texts for use during breaks. By itself, this act would not be considered religious harassment and would not create an impermissible or hostile work environment. With regard to public prayer, I do not have a problem with chaplains ending prayer's with "in Jesus' name" and I understand chaplains are trained to respect others while leading prayer. If confirmed, I will work with the Chaplain Corps regarding these issues to ensure all Air Force members are abiding by and are afforded freedom of religion under all applicable laws, regulations, and policies.

Chairman LEVIN. Now, you've been asked about force structure of the Air Force and the problem which occurred here when there was just a proposal that was dropped on us and the rest of the country on the restructuring and on force structure changes. We've been hearing the Air Force from time to time, or at least members, say that this was a "messaging problem," and that a better rollout strategy would have avoided the problems that they had in presenting or selling their proposals.

Now, this was not a problem of messaging, it was a problem with the substance of the Air Force decision in addition to the problem with the process, the decisionmaking process, where most of the stakeholders are just left out of the decisionmaking process.

You've indicated that you're going to take steps to restore confidence within Congress about the quality of Air Force decisions and decisionmaking process. I just want to add my voice to that issue, because it had a huge effect, I think, on almost all of our States, the way it was done and the substance of what was done.

Now, there's a national commission on the structure of the Air Force. A report is due in February 2014. Would you let us know, as soon as you're confirmed, which we hope will be prompt for you and all of our nominees today, whether or not, in your judgment, that date is going to be met? I'm not asking for you now; I'm saying, after you're confirmed, if you would let us know that.

Do you have a question, Senator Vitter? Senator King?

Secretary Wright, just a question on the Integrated Disability Evaluation System (IDES) and the transition of wounded warriors. We, in our wounded warrior legislation, really took some major steps to integrate the DOD and the VA disability systems. The processing time under the integrated program was established in order to reduce the processing time, but also to get the right standard applied, which would be the more liberal standard from the perspective of the veteran, in our judgment. That was the VA standard. We wanted that to be uniform between DOD and the VA.

There were some additional encouraging reports about processing time, but now our servicemembers and our veterans are mired in long VA disability rating and case disposition wait times, and the VA's portion of the system now appears to be overloaded.

Have you gotten into this, as Acting Secretary? What are you going to do to ensure that the collaboration between DOD and the VA takes place to achieve the objective of providing a timely transition of wounded, ill, and injured servicemembers? Not only that, but also the most favorable standard to our vets?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, sir, absolutely, I have gotten into it. We have about 33,000 members within the entire IDES, presently. The Army is our biggest customer. The Army had a large group of individuals going through IDES that they worked diligently to make sure that they got the benefit they deserved and also the medical treatment that they deserved. They processed them through the system of the Medical Evaluation Board and the Physical Evaluation Board. The next step after that is the VA, and the way the VA is set up, all Army records go to a Seattle site, where they are processed in the VA section of the IDES.

Yes, there is a backlog within the VA, and I will tell you, the VA is working diligently to work through this backlog. But, one of the things that we, DOD, has done to help the VA is, we have sent soldiers, at their request, up to the Seattle VA site. Now, the soldiers cannot process the disability claims, but they can work to do the administrative work that, if the claim adjusters were not doing the disability claims, they had to do all of the administrative work, too. What we have done is take that burden, if you will, off of the claim adjusters so they can focus in on the disability claims that the Army is sending to the Seattle site.

In addition, the VA has recognized that the Seattle site is overwhelmed and cannot necessarily handle all of them in a timely manner, so they are now sending these claims out to other sites that can adjudicate the claims on a quicker, faster timeframe for the individual that is getting out of the system.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay, thank you.

Senator King.

Senator KING. Just one quick fact you might pass on to the VA, in terms of their backlog. Eisenhower retook Europe in 9 months. I don't see any reason that this shouldn't be cleared up in 9 months.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator King.

Now, Senator Gillibrand was here for a long time, but she had to leave. She's going to be submitting her questions for the record. A number of us will be submitting questions for the record. Whoever takes that opportunity, I think we should express the hope that they would get questions for the record in by, let's say, next Monday—close of business, Monday. If that doesn't work for somebody, let our staff know.

If there are no further questions, we want to thank our witnesses. We hope that the committee can take up your nominations very promptly and that you would all be promptly confirmed. That's always a chairman's dream. Let's hope it takes place.

Thanks to you, your families, and your friends who are all here today, and those who aren't here because they had to go to school. [Laughter.]

We'll stand adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 12:10 p.m., the committee adjourned.]

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and the chain of command by clearly delineating the combatant commanders' responsibilities and authorities and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. These reforms have also vastly improved cooperation between the Services and the combatant commanders, among other things, in joint training and education and in the execution of military operations.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. I agree with the goals of these defense reforms; indeed they have yielded a demonstrated improvement in the joint warfighting capabilities of the U.S. military. I do not currently see the need for any modifications.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. None at this time.

Question. Do you believe that the role of the Service Chiefs under the Goldwater-Nichols legislation is appropriate and the policies and processes in existence allow that role to be fulfilled?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you see a need for any change in those roles, with regard to the resource allocation process or otherwise?

Answer. No.

RELATIONSHIPS

He is responsible, on behalf of the Secretary of the Air Force, for the effective and efficient provision of legal services in the Air Force. If confirmed, I would look forward to developing a good working relationship with the General Counsel.

Question. The Judge Advocate General of the Air Force.

Answer. The Judge Advocate General (TJAG), per title 10 U.S.C. § 8037, is the legal advisor of the Secretary of the Air Force and of all officers and agencies of the Department of the Air Force. He is also responsible for directing judge advocates in the performance of their duties. If confirmed, I will endeavor to maintain the close working relationship the Secretary of the Air Force has historically enjoyed with the Judge Advocate General.

Question. The Superintendent of the U.S. Air Force Academy.

Answer. The Academy functions as a separate field operating agency, reporting through the Chief of Staff to the Secretary of the Air Force. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Superintendent to address issues faced by the Academy and to promote the Academy's sustained commitment to excellence and fulfillment of its mission to train and educate future Air Force leaders.

Question. The Director of the National Reconnaissance Office.

Answer. Under current organizational relationships, the Under Secretary of the Air Force is no longer dual-hatted as the Director, National Reconnaissance Office (NRO). However, a strong collaborative relationship between the Air Force and the NRO remains essential to facilitate continuing Air Force technical and personnel support for the NRO's mission. If confirmed, I would be dual hatted as the Executive Agent for Space and I would chair the Defense Space Council where I would have the responsibility of achieving unity of effort across the DOD space enterprise. I would use these and other forums to maintain a close relationship with the Director, NRO, to increase cooperation on space matters.

Question. The Director of National Intelligence.

Answer. It is also vital that a strong collaborative working relationship exist between the Air Force and the Director of National Intelligence. If confirmed, I will work with the Director of National Intelligence to foster that relationship, particularly in coordination of national security space matters.

DUTIES

Question. What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. Pursuant to title 10 U.S.C. § 8013 and subject to the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Air Force is responsible for and has the authority necessary to conduct all affairs of the Department of the Air Force. These functions include organizing, supplying, equipping, training, maintaining, and administering the Air Force.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what duties and functions do you expect that the Secretary of Defense would prescribe for you?

Answer. If confirmed as the Secretary of the Air Force, I would expect the Secretary of Defense to assign duties to me consistent with the responsibilities outlined above.

Question. Do you believe that there are actions you need to take to enhance your ability to perform the duties of the Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. Title 10 provides for two staffs in the same headquarters, a predominantly military Air Staff and a predominantly civilian Secretariat. My intention is that these two staffs will function effectively together as a single headquarters team supporting the needs of both the Chief of Staff and the Secretary, while protecting the Chief of Staff's independent advisory role as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I will foster close working relationships between the civilian and military staffs and work with them on matters within their areas of responsibility in order to more effectively lead and manage the Department of the Air Force.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. I have worked for more than 3 decades as a civilian in support of our military—from the executive branch, to Capitol Hill, to the world of think tanks, to the defense industry, and as a volunteer in some of the wonderful non-profits which help our military, veterans and their families in ways that government cannot.

Specifically, I served 17 years in the Government, first for the Department of the Army, followed by service on the House Armed Services Committee Staff, and then in the Pentagon as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs. Subsequently, I worked for 15 years in the private sector with United Technologies Corporation, the Business Executives for National Security and, Science Applications International Corporation (SAIC). Throughout this time, I served on boards as a volunteer with the USO, the Tragedy Assistance Program for Survivors, the Pentagon Federal Credit Union Foundation, and other military charities, as well as serving on the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services (DACOWITS), an advisory body to the Secretary of Defense on matters affecting our women in uniform.

I am absolutely committed to keeping the U.S. Air Force the very best Air Force in the world.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges that will confront the Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. The top challenges for the next Secretary of the Air Force are near-term readiness and building the most capable, affordable Air Force for 2023. The Air Force must always be prepared to answer the Nation's call, and that means we need airmen with the right training and the right equipment that can complete the difficult tasks and missions they are asked to do when they are asked to do them. If confirmed, I will do everything in my power to ensure our Air Force is ready to take on near-term missions as well as build toward the challenges of the future.

The next Secretary of the Air Force will also face challenges with regard to strategy and execution in today's difficult fiscal reality. If confirmed, I will work to ensure Air Force strategy is focused on supporting the President's National Security Strategy, the Defense Strategic Guidance, and within budgets provided, I will work to ensure the ability to execute the strategy. At this time in our country's history—when airmen have been in the fight for more than 2 decades, as aging aircraft and other critical equipment have reached or will soon reach the point of needing modernization or replacement, and as Federal budget resources decline—program and budget decisions and tradeoffs cannot be avoided.

No matter what challenges confront us, our force must be confident that leaders are focused on taking care of our airmen and their families. If confirmed, my approach to decisionmaking will always keep an eye toward taking care of our airmen.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the Chief of Staff of the Air Force, the commanders of the Service's major commands, and the Headquarters Air Force staff to identify the most urgent readiness concerns in the short- , medium-, and long-term. We must address these concerns in tandem with a realistic assessment of the Service's ability to execute the defense strategy, coupled with a realistic assessment of the current fiscal environment. We must take these issues into account during future program and budget planning.

Question. What do you consider to be the most serious problems in the performance of the functions of the Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. I am impressed with the professionalism and expertise of the men and women who serve in the U.S. Air Force. If confirmed, I will gather data to understand priorities and work with leaders to determine solutions. Additionally, I will strive to foster an environment that encourages communication within the Air Force and DOD, across the interagency, and with the legislative branch. Good communication is an important part of any effort to addressing issues that affect our airmen and our Nation.

Question. If confirmed, what management actions and timelines would you establish to address these problems?

Answer. If confirmed, I will begin an extensive internal Air Force communication effort on my first day. From that point on, I will seek to establish a stronger communications foundation that builds on existing relationships with external stakeholders, including Congress, national security experts, and airpower advocates.

PRIORITIES

Question. If confirmed, what broad priorities will you establish?

Answer. If confirmed, I will focus on three broad priorities. First, I will be committed to taking care of people. This priority includes: recruiting and training a quality force; focusing on ending the blight of sexual assault in the Air Force; finding the right balance between the Active Duty, Reserve component, and civilian airmen who make up the Total Force; and taking care of airmen and military families.

Second, if confirmed, I will make it a priority to balance today's readiness with tomorrow's modernization needs, while supporting the requirements of combatant commanders. The nuclear enterprise will receive special attention as will increasing confidence in the acquisition process.

Third, if confirmed, I will work to ensure that the world's best Air Force is the most capable and at the lowest possible cost to the taxpayer.

READINESS LEVELS

Question. What is your assessment of the current readiness of the Air Force to execute its assigned missions?

Answer. It is my understanding that readiness has suffered, particularly under sequester. Reductions to the fiscal year 2014 President's budget would further harm readiness.

Question. How do you believe sequestration may have affected readiness?

Answer. I am aware the Air Force stood down 13 Active Duty combat squadron equivalents and 18 institutional squadrons in fiscal year 2013. I have been briefed that recovering the readiness levels of these units will take well into fiscal year 2014. The Air Force cancelled one of two Weapon Instructor Courses and curtailed or cancelled three of six Red Flag exercises. This advanced training is critical to gain and maintain readiness at the high-end of training requirements.

Curtailing and or cancelling this advanced training results in a readiness deficit "bathtub"—the Air Force cannot make up these events.

Question. Can the Air Force meet all combatant command requirements with its current readiness status?

Answer. Air Force leadership has said no, the Air Force cannot currently meet all combatant command requirements. Air Force leadership has also stated the Air Force can meet current combatant commander requirements only with the use of rotational forces. In doing so, the Air Force has few if any ready forces for emergent combatant command requirements.

Question. What do you view as the other major readiness challenges that will have to be addressed by the Air Force over the next 5 years, and, if confirmed, how will you approach all of these issues?

Answer. In addition to working toward a restoration of full spectrum training levels, the next 5 years will be critical for building the readiness and capabilities of tomorrow. Capability includes the requisite technology and weapons necessary to prevail in a highly-contested, anti-access/area-denial environment. If confirmed, I will focus on the critical and unique capabilities the Air Force provides to our Nation and the joint warfighters.

ANNUAL INCREASE IN RATES OF BASIC PAY BELOW THE EMPLOYMENT COST INDEX

Question. The Department has requested an across-the-board pay raise for 2014 for military personnel of 1 percent, versus a 1.8 percent rise in the Employment

Cost Index (ECI) benchmark, and has indicated that in order to restrain the growth of personnel costs, similar below-ECI pay raises may be necessary over the next several years.

What is your assessment of the impact a 1 percent pay raise would have on recruiting and retention in the Air Force for 2014? What would be the impact of a 1 percent pay raise in 2015 through 2017?

Answer. I believe military compensation is, and must remain, competitive to sustain the recruitment and retention of high caliber men and women to meet readiness requirements and accomplish the national security mission; however, in light of the current economic crisis and overall reductions in defense spending, the Air Force must look at balancing personnel costs to avoid reductions to force structure and modernization efforts critical to support the warfighter and national defense.

In the short term, I am hopeful that a 1 percent pay raise will have a negligible impact upon overall recruiting and retention. I believe that sustained pay raises below ECI warrant close monitoring of the force, given the expected improvements in the economy.

FORCE STRUCTURE CHANGES

Question. For fiscal year 2013, the Air Force proposed major changes in the force structure, with the cuts falling more heavily in the Air National Guard. These proposals were soundly rejected by Congress, based on both the content of the decisions and the way the decisions were made.

If you are confirmed as Secretary of the Air Force, what steps would you propose to take to restore confidence within Congress about the quality of the Air Force's decisions and decisionmaking process?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with Congress on all issues relating to the Total Force. I believe the Air Force is committed to the Total Force (Active, Guard, Reserve) and, through efforts like the Total Force Task Force and a detailed, analytically rigorous Force Composition Analysis process, the Service will strengthen its decisionmaking in this area.

If confirmed, I plan to ensure that the decisionmaking process is highly collaborative and involves all key stakeholders from the Active component, the Air National Guard, and the Air Force Reserve. The components are key participants throughout the development, integration, and defense of the Air Force Program Objective Memorandum and implementation of the congressionally-approved budget. Additionally, a newly established consultative process involving DOD, Council of Governors, and individual States promises an even more enhanced, interactive relationship. Taken collectively, I believe these efforts will help the Air Force continue to improve the quality and transparency in its' decisionmaking process and will help restore Congress's confidence in the Air Force's firm commitment to the Total Force. Finally, I look forward to working with the National Commission on the Structure of the Air Force to provide a Total Force solution.

Question. If sequestration continues through 2018, what would be the impact, in your view, on the Active Duty and Reserve end strengths of the Air Force and how would the mix between the Active and Reserve Forces be affected?

Answer. I cannot make an assessment at this time on the future mix between Active and Reserve Forces, but if confirmed, I will work closely with Congress, State Governors, and the Reserve components to determine the right balance between Active and Reserve Forces to most efficiently satisfy force structure requirements. If sequestration continues, I would expect the end strength of both the Active Duty and the Reserve to decrease.

RESERVE DEPLOYMENT AND MOBILIZATION

Question. We understand that the Air Force may be implementing a policy of filling deployments assigned to Air Guard and Air Reserve units by ordering those units to Active Duty while specifically excluding the use of volunteers from outside those units.

What effect do you believe this policy will have on the ability of the Air Force Reserve and Air Guard to meet deployment commitments and fulfill combat missions?

Answer. I have been briefed that this new construct does not impact the ability of the Reserve component to meet their deployment commitments. If confirmed, I will dig more deeply in to this approach.

Question. Do you support assigning any support missions exclusively to the Reserve?

Answer. At this time I cannot definitively answer this question.

SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

Question. In 2012, for the fourth year in a row, there were more than 3000 reported cases of sexual assault in the military, including 2558 unrestricted reports, and an additional 816 restricted reports. Moreover, a recent survey conducted by DOD indicates that the actual number of sexual offenses could be considerably higher, as 6.1 percent of Active Duty women and 1.2 percent of Active Duty men surveyed reported having experienced an incident of unwanted sexual contact in the previous 12 months. This survey has been criticized by some because its conclusions are extrapolated from an unscientific sample set and the questions asked in the survey were too imprecise. The Air Force recently addressed numerous allegations of sexual misconduct by Military Training Instructors at Basic Military Training at Joint Base San Antonio-Lackland. The Air Force addressed similar allegations of sexual misconduct at the Air Force Academy nearly a decade ago.

What is your assessment of the Air Force response to the allegations of sexual assault at Basic Military Training at Joint Base San Antonio-Lackland?

Answer. Sexual assault is an egregious and horrific crime wherever and whenever it occurs. The instances and allegations of sexual assault, unprofessional relationships, and other misconduct at Basic Military Training have been particularly troubling to me.

My assessment is that the Air Force acted aggressively to investigate, prosecute, punish perpetrators; and hold leaders accountable for the incidents at Lackland. Although we were able to take decisive action once senior leaders became aware of the crimes, I am concerned about that many victims did not feel comfortable reporting and there was a substantial delay in reporting many of the incidents at Lackland.

Over the past year, there appears to have been steady and positive progress. To the best of my knowledge, there has not been an allegation of recent Military Training Instructor sexual misconduct for more than 13 months. If confirmed, I look forward to working with Air Force leadership to ensure that Basic Military Training is a safe, secure environment and the most professionally executed training program in the world for Air Force trainees. I am committed to ensuring that the Air Force training environments foster a culture of respect where this behavior is not tolerated and victims are empowered to report any crime.

Question. What is your assessment of the Air Force's implementation of the Secretary's new policies?

Answer. It is my understanding of the Secretary's 6 May initiatives, the Air Force has implemented a legal advocacy program for victims, required that judge advocate general officers conduct pre-trial investigations and provide commanders the option to temporarily remove members accused of sexual assault from the unit. The Air Force is on track to complete the remaining three additional reforms in the next year. These include standardizing processes by which sexual assault allegations are elevated to a general or flag officer, ensure consistent standards prohibiting inappropriate conduct by trainers and recruiters, and submit to regular audits to ensure military investigations of sexual assault cases meet DOD-wide standards. I will work with the other Services and the Secretary of Defense to ensure we implement these coordinated efforts as soon as possible. One of these key reforms, the Special Victims Counsel program, was an Air Force program and illustrates the innovative and progressive efforts to enhance victim advocacy and protection. The Air Force established this as a pilot program in January 2013 and the 14 August Executive Action memo directed its adoption across DOD.

Question. What is your view about the role of the chain of command in changing the military culture in which these sexual assaults have occurred?

Answer. In my view, the chain of command has, and should retain, ultimate responsibility for the morale, welfare, good order, discipline, and effectiveness of military units. In the past the chain of command has been effective in dealing with issues such as racial integration, drug use during the Vietnam war, and the "Don't Ask/Don't Tell" policy. We need to ensure they place the same focus and emphasis on sexual assault. The chain of command must be held directly responsible for the climate and behavior of their airmen and women. They must be given both the incentives and the tools to ensure a climate of respect permeates their command.

Question. In your view, what would be the impact of requiring a judge advocate outside the chain of command to determine whether allegations of sexual assault should be prosecuted?

Answer. I have not found sufficient evidence to support the proposal that removing commanders from the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) process and replacing them with judge advocates outside the chain of command will improve the sexual assault response or accountability processes.

Judge advocates are already a huge part of the process. I have been briefed that in nearly every case in the last 3 years Air Force commanders agreed with their staff judge advocates' recommendations to send allegations of sexual assault to court-martial. Therefore, it does not appear that removing commanders from their UCMJ disposition role will result in a large increase in prosecutions.

Additionally, I do not believe we can solve the sexual assault problem by reducing commanders' authority to hold airmen accountable. The challenge we face regarding sexual assault in the military is complex and requires commanders be fully involved in its solution. Rather than remove commanders' authority to send airmen to a court-martial for committing sexual assault, I believe commanders must be held more accountable for failing to adequately respond to sexual assaults in their units or for failing to maintain a healthy unit climate necessary to safeguard against the rise of sexual assault. Commanders must be fostering an environment in which victims are encouraged to report any crimes and feel safeguarded from any risk of reprisal or career consequences.

Question. What is your view of the protections afforded to victims who are required to testify at Article 32, UCMJ, investigations that are required before charges can be referred to a General Court-Martial?

Answer. I am not satisfied. I have been disturbed by recent press reports from the Article 32 process in the Naval Academy sexual assault case and I feel the Article 32 process needs to be improved to ensure better protection of victims' rights.

I would note that one improvement to the Article 32 hearing process is already being undertaken. Secretary Hagel has directed that all Article 32 Investigating Officers for sexual assault charges must be judge advocates. This has long been the practice in the Air Force. I believe we could enhance the effectiveness of judge advocates by ensuring they receive better training specifically tailored to the host of challenging issues in sexual assault cases.

Question. What is your understanding of the resources and programs the Air Force has in place to provide victims of sexual assaults the medical, psychological, and legal help that they need?

Answer. As I learned about the programs the Air Force provides for victims of sexual assault, I was impressed with the whole-person concept employed for healing. The Air Force recognizes resiliency is built through having a strong physical, mental, spiritual, and social core. In response to both restricted and unrestricted reports, the Air Force provides physical, psychological, spiritual, legal, and social support to victims. This support continues until the victim feels stronger in the healing process and decides they no longer require those services. The Air Force recognizes healing is unique to every person and provides victims the necessary time and resources to recover. Air Force medical personnel, lawyers, sexual assault response coordinators (SARC) and victim advocates (VA) are dedicated to victim well-being and returning the victim to a healthy state. This care is provided both in garrison and deployed.

Question. What is your view of the steps the Air Force has taken to prevent additional sexual assaults? In your view, are these steps adequate?

Answer. I believe the Air Force is absolutely committed to fighting sexual assault in its ranks. It has a new directorate-level sexual assault prevention and response (SAPR) office led by a two-star general with a team of cross-functional dedicated experts and is dedicating other resources to attack this crime. If confirmed, a top priority for me will be to focus on institutionalizing the changes passed by Congress and ordered by Secretary Hagel as well as any new tools Congress gives along the way. I will:

- Make sure victims know it's not their fault—report if it happens
- Take care of victims with compassion and without retaliation
- Aggressively weed out, investigate and prosecute offenders
- Hold commanders more accountable for what goes on in their units
- Make clear there are consequences for individuals who engage in violence and disrespect of other airmen. We don't want them in the Air Force
- Work with DOD and Air Force leaders, Congress, and the Panel on Military Justice to review other ideas

The Air Force implemented the Special Victims Counsel program which has proven to be a benchmark for all of DOD. The Air Force implemented new administrative discharge provisions in July 2013, under which commanders must initiate involuntary administrative discharge processing for any airman, officer or enlisted, who commits sexual assault, sexual assault of a child, or attempts to commit these crimes. Additionally, an Air Force member who engages in an unprofessional relationship while serving in a special position of trust (i.e., recruiter, faculty member, or staff member) is specifically subject to administrative discharge for misconduct. The Air Force is currently developing a Basic Military Training Transition Program which will reinforce Air Force core values and emphasizes appropriate behavior. The Air Force developed the bill of rights for all airmen, ensuring they understand how they should be treated and how to treat others. The National Organization of Victim Assistance provides credentialing for Air Force counselors. Its continuing education requirements ensure ongoing support from diverse civilian as well as military institutions which will give our SARC and victim advocates (VA) expanded resources to stay abreast of best practices emerging in prevention and care.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of the training and resources the Air Force has in place to investigate and respond to allegations of sexual assault?

Answer. It is my understanding every Air Force Office of Special Investigation (AFOSI) special agent is trained and credentialed at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center to handle myriad felony investigations, including sexual assaults. In addition, the Air Force added 24 civilian AFOSI sexual assault trained special agents at high threat installations and designated 9 senior trial counsels with advanced training to prosecute these cases. The Air Force developed training in fiscal year 2013 that JAGs now attend jointly with AFOSI. These training courses are the Sex Crimes Investigation Training Program at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center and the Advanced Sexual Assault Litigation Course at the Air Force JAG School.

AFOSI and JAGs attend both courses, focusing on the investigation and prosecution stages.

Question. Do you consider the Air Force's current sexual assault policies and procedures, particularly those on confidential reporting, to be effective?

Answer. The policies are broad and appear comprehensive yet not enough victim's report—so more needs to be done to ensure victims understand that if a crime occurs, the Air Force will hold those responsible accountable for their crime. The Air Force also needs to make clear that it is never the victim's fault and that in addition to prosecution, the Air Force is committed to providing compassionate care for victims and protecting them against any risk of retaliation.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of resources in the Air Force to investigate allegations of sexual misconduct and to hold perpetrators accountable for their actions?

Answer. I am aware the Air Force has dedicated additional resources over the last few years; if confirmed, I will make a more complete assessment of adequacy.

Question. What problems, if any, are you aware of in the manner in which the confidential reporting procedures have been put into effect?

Answer. Not enough victims report—this is obviously a problem. I will need to dig more deeply into "why", if I am confirmed. My experience says that victims fear they will not be believed, they feel ashamed and they may be worried that they will be ostracized or retaliated against by leadership and peers.

Question. What is your view of the appropriate role for senior military and civilian leaders in the Secretariat and the Air staff in overseeing the effectiveness of implementation of new policies relating to sexual assault?

Answer. Senior military and civilian leaders, beginning with the Secretariat and Air Staff, must focus on promoting an environment that does not tolerate sexual assault. Eliminating the stigma of reporting this crime is essential. Senior leaders must instill the belief that if an assault occurs, reporting is necessary and expected, whether unrestricted or restricted. Airmen need to believe their chain will support them through the legal and healing processes, while holding perpetrators appropriately accountable.

Currently, the Air Force's SAPR Council joins the most senior members from across the Service for monthly discussion of program initiatives, issues, and best practices. If confirmed, I will expect all leaders to be personally engaged in Sexual Assault Prevention and Response.

Question. Do you believe that sexual assault continues to be an underreported crime within the Department for the Air Force?

Answer. Sexual assault is likely a highly underreported violent crime in American society, and yes I believe it continues to be an underreported crime within the Air Force as well. The sexual assault prevalence survey performed by Gallup in 2010 also confirmed this view. The Air Force remains committed to improved reporting and will administer a follow-up prevalence survey this spring.

Question. If so, what are the barriers that discourage or prevent victims from coming forward?

Answer. Based on my experience from DACOWITS working groups and briefings, victims not wanting fellow airmen to know and victims not wanting their families to know are significant barriers to reporting. Victims may also fear for impact on their career if they report at about a fellow servicemember.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps would you take to remove these barriers to reporting sexual assaults?

Answer. If confirmed, I will build on the core values of the Air Force by demanding an environment that identifies perpetrators and holds them appropriately accountable, a climate where victims feel empowered to come forward to report this crime.

Additionally, I believe commanders should be "graded" on their performance reports for the sexual assault reporting climate in their unit.

I think we can affect change; we have to stay on it each and every day. One of the greatest challenges will be helping airmen of all ranks assess personal roles in preventing this crime and understand how to improve decisionmaking. This will take time, but I will work closely with the Air Force team to focus on this complex issue.

AIR FORCE POLICIES REGARDING DRUG AND ALCOHOL ABUSE

Question. What is your understanding of the Air Force's policy with respect to disciplinary action and administrative separation of soldiers who have been determined to have used illegal drugs? Do you agree with this policy?

Answer. Air Force policy states that drug abuse is incompatible with Military Service and airmen who abuse drugs one or more times are subject to administrative separation for misconduct. In fact, administrative separation processing is mandatory for drug abuse unless a waiver is granted. This seems to be the appropriate policy to me. The Air Force recently adopted the same discharge policy for sexual assault, which I also believe will help deter and combat sexual assault in the Air Force.

Question. What is your understanding of the Air Force's policy with respect to rehabilitation and retention on active duty of soldiers who have been determined to have used illegal drugs or abused alcohol or prescription drugs? Do you agree with this policy?

Answer. It is my understanding that only in very limited circumstances does the Air Force retain airmen who we determine have used illegal drugs, including illegal use of prescription drugs. In order to be retained, airmen have the burden of proving that retention is warranted by meeting a number of criteria, to include such drug use was a departure from the airman's usual behavior and is not likely to recur, does not involve recurring incidents, and does not involve distribution.

I would like to ensure that the Air Force has a robust Alcohol and Drug Abuse Prevention and Treatment (ADAPT) Program. If confirmed, I look forward to reviewing this program to determine its adequacy.

Question. Do you believe that the Air Force has devoted sufficient resources to implementation of its rehabilitation policies and objectives since 2001? If not, in what ways?

Answer. I cannot say at this time, but look forward to reviewing this program, if confirmed.

SUICIDE PREVENTION

Question. The number of suicides in the total Air Force continues to be of concern to the committee.

If confirmed, what role would you play in shaping suicide prevention programs and policies for the Air Force, the Air National Guard, and the Air Force Reserve, to prevent suicides and increase the resiliency of airmen and their families?

Answer. I believe that effective suicide prevention programs start at the top and require engaged leaders and communities to be effective. If confirmed I will champion the Air Force's continuing efforts in building a strong wingman culture where leaders at every level establish a command climate where airmen know that they should seek help early, before problems become unmanageable.

Of the airmen lost to suicide over the last year, causes included relationship difficulties, legal and financial problems. These very personal factors highlight the need for continuing vigilance and an effective culture of airmen looking out for one another. When required, I will ensure that all of our airmen have access to the counseling and support services they need to help them through any difficult times.

If confirmed, I will work with Air Force and DOD leaders to ensure that we look for and adopt best practices in suicide prevention for all components of the Air Force, always emphasizing that concerned, engaged leaders and communities are the solution.

RELIGIOUS GUIDELINES

Question. In your view, do policies concerning religious accommodation in the military appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs, including individual expressions of belief, without impinging on those who have different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. I believe so. The policies are intended to protect both the free exercise of religion for all airmen and avoid the appearance of an official endorsement of any particular religion. Air Force policy presently communicates that all airmen have the freedom to choose to practice their particular religion or subscribe to no religious belief at all.

Question. Under current law and policy, are individual expressions of belief accommodated so long as they do not impact good order and discipline?

Answer. This is certainly my understanding. Current law and policies allow for accommodation of individual airmen's expressions of belief so long as such expressions do not adversely impact good order and discipline.

Question. In your view, do existing policies and practices regarding public prayers offered by military chaplains in a variety of formal and informal settings strike the proper balance between a chaplain's ability to pray in accordance with his or her religious beliefs and the rights of other servicemembers with different beliefs, including no religious beliefs?

Answer. It is my understanding Air Force chaplains are well trained to provide prayers offered in pluralistic settings. This requires sensitivity to their audience which includes individuals from various religious traditions as well as those who profess no religious belief at all. The guidance provided by Air Force leaders also makes clear that supervisors respect each chaplains' right to adhere to the tenets of his or her faith and thus not require chaplains to participate in religious activities, including public prayer, which are inconsistent with their faith tradition.

FAMILY READINESS AND SUPPORT

Question. Military members and their families in both the Active and Reserve components have made, and continue to make, tremendous sacrifices in support of operational deployments. Senior military leaders have warned of concerns among military families as a result of the stress of deployments and the separations that go with them.

What do you consider to be the most important family readiness issues for Air Force personnel and their families, and, if confirmed, how would you ensure that family readiness needs are addressed and adequately resourced?

Answer. I understand that a primary concern for airmen and their family members is their ability to do the mission and simultaneously support their families. Specific areas of concern include access to quality specialized child care and education. Also, for those transitioning to the civilian sector, military members are concerned about being prepared for employment and/or continuing their education. Families are concerned about the civilian spouse finding employment as they relocate from installation to installation. Finally, I believe the work/life balance is a major issue. If confirmed, I will ensure a thorough review of all available resources to support valuable family programs.

Question. How would you address these family readiness needs in light of global rebasing, deployments, and future reductions in end strength?

Answer. I understand the Airman and Family Readiness Centers serve as a resource hub for Air Force families prior-to, during, and following deployments. The deployment programs the Airman and Family Readiness Center have in place for the airmen and family members are crucial in supporting the Mission. If confirmed, I will seek input from a variety of sources including from family members themselves and will work to ensure the Air Force programs adequately support Air Force families.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure support is provided to Reserve component families related to mobilization, deployment and family readiness, as well as to Active Duty families who do not reside near a military installation?

Answer. The Air Force is a Total Force, and provides resources and support to all components through various Airman and Family and Child and Youth programs. Geographically separated servicemembers (and their families) have immediate access to many resources online that enable them to remain connected to their units and support services. I look forward to exploring the adequacy of existing programs in this area.

Question. If confirmed, what steps will you take to sustain Air Force family support, given current fiscal constraints?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the Chief of Staff and Chief Master Sergeant of the Air Force to engage Air Force families on the support they feel is most needed.

I will review current manpower and staffing for family programs and support programs that enhance Mission Readiness. I would like to see sufficient staffing and training for family readiness staff as we partner with community organizations to continue building support for airmen and their families.

MORALE, WELFARE, AND RECREATION

Question. Morale, Welfare, and Recreation (MWR) programs are critical to enhancement of military life for members and their families, especially in light of frequent and sometimes lengthy deployments. These programs must be relevant and attractive to all eligible users, including Active Duty and Reserve personnel, retirees, and families.

What challenges do you foresee in sustaining Air Force MWR programs, particularly in view of the current fiscal environment, and if confirmed, are there any improvements you would seek to achieve?

Answer. MWR programs help the Air Force to maintain ready, resilient airmen and families, and sustained reductions to these programs may negatively impact future readiness and unit cohesion. If confirmed, my goal would be to determine how best to provide the most critical family and MWR programs and base-level support services possible in today's budget-constrained environment.

Regardless of constrained budgets, I am committed to supporting our airmen and their families and will make adjustments based on available funding in an effort to focus our resources where they are needed most.

MANAGEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SENIOR EXECUTIVE SERVICE (SES)

Question. The transformation of the Armed Forces has brought with it an increasing realization of the importance of efficient and forward thinking management of senior executives.

What is your vision for the management and development of the Air Force's senior executive workforce, especially in the critically important areas of acquisition, financial management, and the scientific and technical fields?

Answer. I believe that the members of the Senior Executive Service are an integral and critical component to the continued success of these vital career fields.

Question. Over the last 10 years, the Air Force budget has almost doubled, but the number of senior executives in the Department of the Air Force has remained almost unchanged.

Do you believe that the Air Force has the number of senior executives it needs, with the proper skills to manage the Department in the future?

Answer. I have not yet had the opportunity to review the number of Air Force senior executives and their associated proficiency levels in critical competencies. If confirmed, I will look into the issue.

BALANCE BETWEEN CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES AND CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEES

Question. In recent years, the Air Force and DOD have become increasingly reliant on services provided by contractors. In many cases, contractor employees work in the same offices, serve on the same projects and task forces, and perform many of the same functions as Federal employees.

Do you believe that the current balance between civilian employees and contractor employees is in the best interests of the Air Force and DOD?

Answer. It is difficult to make a macro-level statement about this issue at this time. I do believe we must continue to ensure that inherently governmental functions are not outsourced and scrutinize those areas where the distinction has been blurred. It is also important to step back and look at all work accomplished by military, civilian, and contractor to achieve the correct balance. If confirmed, I will work with leaders across the Air Force to assess this matter to ensure compliance with the law and with the President's policy.

Question. In your view, has the Air Force become too reliant on contractors to perform its basic functions?

Answer. Once again, I cannot offer a macro-level view at this time. I recognize this is an area of concern and will address it if confirmed.

Question. Do you believe that the current extensive use of personal services contracts is in the best interest of the Air Force?

Answer. The Federal Acquisition Regulation and title 10 U.S.C., section 129, restricts the use of personal services contracts. I believe these regulations best serve the interests of the Air Force. If confirmed, I would continue to work with leaders across the Air Force to ensure compliance with applicable law and policy. I believe my experience in both the private and public sector can help in this area.

Question. Do you believe that the Air Force and DOD should undertake a comprehensive reappraisal of "inherently governmental functions" and other critical government functions, and how they are performed?

Answer. The Department's "sourcing" of functions and work between military and civilians, or through contracted services, must be consistent with workload requirements, funding availability, readiness and management needs, as well as applicable laws and statutes. The Air Force should ensure that military or Federal civilians are performing all inherently governmental jobs, and that sufficient levels of civilians are available to perform critical oversight, management, and readiness functions of the Air Force. I am not convinced a comprehensive review of "inherently governmental functions" is necessary, but I do believe more rigorous oversight where we apply contracted services is necessary across the Department.

Question. If confirmed, will you work with other appropriate officials in DOD to address these issues?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to collaborate with other Air Force leaders to ensure these matters are addressed in the best interest of the Air Force and DOD.

Question. Section 808 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 requires DOD to implement a freeze on spending for contract services, comparable to the freeze on civilian personnel required by the efficiencies initiatives.

What is your understanding of the impact that the freeze on spending for contract services has had on the Air Force?

Answer. Specific to fiscal year 2012 and fiscal year 2013, the period covered by the NDAA, my understanding is the limitation is a broad brush that puts an overall ceiling on not only management support contracts, but also other mission critical contracts such as Weapon System Sustainment, Ranges, and Critical Infrastructure. If the limitation is so broad that it encompasses all contracts, there may be unintended consequences that we will need to monitor. If confirmed, I look forward to working with Air Force leaders to balance acceptable risks and available budgets to ensure future mission capability as freezes to civilian personnel and contract services are carried out.

Question. What is your understanding of Air Force plans for spending for contract services over the next 5 years?

Answer. At this time I am unfamiliar with the specifics of Air Force plans for contract services over the next 5 years. If confirmed, I will work with Air Force leaders to properly balance contract services spending with other Air Force priorities.

Question. What is your view on the feasibility and advisability of further reductions in spending for contract services over the next 5 years?

Answer. Without an understanding of specific Air Force plans for contract services over the next 5 years, I cannot at this time assess the feasibility and advisability of further reductions. Any budget adjustments must be made carefully and with full understanding of the accepted risks and impacts to mission capability.

AIR FORCE CIVILIAN PERSONNEL WORKFORCE

Question. Section 955 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 required the Secretary of Defense to develop a plan to reduce the size of the civilian personnel workforce by 5 percent over the next 5 years. The plan developed by the Secretary does not meet this objective. Since the time that section 955 was enacted, the Department has implemented hiring freezes and furloughs due to sequestration.

As a result, the DOD civilian personnel workforce is substantially smaller than it was when section 955 was enacted or at the time the plan was submitted.

Do you agree that the Air Force's civilian employee workforce plays a vital role in the functioning of the Department of the Air Force?

Answer. The U.S. Air Force would not be the best in the world without the daily contributions of civilian airmen as vital members of the Air Force family and the joint team. They are integral to nearly every part of the Air Force mission, from processing recruits and running family programs, to managing budgets and developing strategy. They fix airplanes, sustain infrastructure, design and develop future systems, and deploy to support combatant commanders. The Air Force could not get by without its civilians.

Question. Do you agree that if sequestration continues through fiscal year 2014 and beyond, the Air Force will need to further reduce the size of its civilian workforce?

Answer. This seems extremely likely, in my opinion.

Question. In your view, would it be preferable for the Air Force to make planned, prioritized reductions to its civilian workforce, or to downsize using arbitrary reductions based on hiring freezes and workforce attrition?

Answer. In my view, planned and prioritized reductions always are preferable to arbitrary reductions.

ACQUISITION ISSUES

Question. Major Defense Acquisition Programs (MDAPs) in the Air Force and the other Military Services continue to be subject to funding and requirements instability.

Do you believe that instability in funding and requirements drives up program costs and leads to delays in the fielding of major weapon systems?

Answer. Yes, instability in funding and requirements contributes to increases in program cost and schedule delays. A major imperative of mine would be to improve the acquisition process.

Question. What steps, if any, do you believe the Air Force should take to address funding and requirements instability?

Answer. I believe that it is incumbent on the acquisition community to work with the requirements and resource communities to ensure programs have clear, achievable requirements and realistic funding profiles. The acquisition community must bring its technical expertise to the discussion of requirements and funding throughout the acquisition progress to enable requirements and funding profiles that are inherently stable because they are realistic and affordable.

I support USD(AT&L)'s affordability initiative to establish goals and caps to ensure funding limitations are identified early and revalidated at milestone decisions. If confirmed I would work closely with the Air Force and DOD leadership to assess root causes and sources of instability, and work to put in place measures to limit their occurrence.

Question. The Government Accountability Office (GAO) has reported that the use of insufficiently mature technologies has resulted in significant cost and schedule growth in the MDAPs of the Air Force and the other military departments. Section 2366a of title 10, U.S.C., requires the Milestone Decision Authority for an MDAP to certify that critical technologies have reached an appropriate level of maturity before Milestone B approval.

Do you believe that the use of insufficiently mature technologies drives up program costs and leads to delays in the fielding of major weapon systems?

Answer. Yes, it is my understanding that premature pursuit of insufficiently mature technologies can result in schedule and cost growth. The growth would likely occur as one works to overcome technology challenges that were not adequately budgeted for at the outset of the development or production activity.

Question. What steps will you take, if confirmed, to make sure that the Air Force complies with the requirements of section 2366a?

Answer. If confirmed, I will advocate strongly for the nomination of a qualified acquisition executive. I will work to ensure we have the right people in place to oversee and address the maturity of technologies and work closely with USD(AT&L) on other initiatives.

Question. GAO has reported that the use of unrealistically optimistic cost and schedule estimates by the Air Force and the other military departments is a major contributor to cost growth and program failure.

Do you believe that the use of unrealistically optimistic cost and schedule estimates leads to program disruptions that drive up program costs and delay the fielding of major weapon systems?

Answer. Yes, I do. Ensuring we have realistic weapon system cost and schedule estimates, to include a comprehensive understanding of total life-cycle costs, better informs decisionmakers as they manage current acquisition programs. Realistic estimates are critical to prevent pursuit of systems that are later abandoned or reduced in capabilities because of an unacceptably high cost. Cost and schedule estimating methodologies that combine historical data with the best information available on new industry and government acquisition practices produce more accurate estimates, preventing cost growth and fielding delays.

Question. What steps do you believe the Air Force should take to ensure that cost and schedule estimates are fair and independent and provide a sound basis for Air Force programs?

Answer. Since the passage of Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act of 2009, I believe the Air Force has made progress in improving the quality of its cost estimates and also in more rigorously budgeting to the best cost estimates. New policy guidance and procedures have been adopted that require annual, independent cost estimates on all major acquisition programs. This has resulted in more realistic, objective cost estimates in support of the budget process and acquisition decisions.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology and Logistics has issued a memorandum directing the military departments to institute new "Configuration Steering Boards" to review and approve new requirements that could add significantly to the costs of major systems.

Do you support this process?

Answer. I am not familiar with the USD(AT&L) Configuration Steering Board (CSB) policy memorandum. I understand, however, that CSBs are important to good program oversight and cost control. I also understand they are legislated requirements. If confirmed I will ensure the Air Force complies with all Federal statutes.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics has also issued a memorandum directing that the largest DOD acquisition programs undergo competitive prototyping to ensure technological maturity, reduce technical risk, validate designs, cost estimates, evaluate manufacturing processes, and refine requirements.

Do you support this requirement?

Answer. Yes, I support the requirement that the largest DOD acquisition programs undergo competitive prototyping, where practical and affordable.

Question. Numerous acquisition reviews over the last decade have identified shortcomings and gaps in the acquisition workforce of DOD. Section 852 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008 established an Acquisition Workforce Development Fund to provide the resources needed to begin rebuilding the Department's corps of acquisition professionals.

Do you believe that a properly sized workforce of appropriately trained acquisition professionals is essential if the Air Force is going to get good value for the expenditure of public resources?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. How would such a priority compete within the context of implementing sequestration?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work to ensure the Air Force maintains a properly sized and well trained acquisition workforce, even in tough budgetary times.

CONTRACT MANAGEMENT

Question. By some estimates, DOD now spends more money every year for the acquisition of services than it does for the acquisition of products, including major weapon systems. Yet, the Department places far less emphasis on staffing, training, and managing the acquisition of services than it does on the acquisition of products.

What steps, if any, do you believe the Air Force should take to improve the staffing, training, and management of its acquisition of services?

Answer. I understand the Air Force is focused on improving its acquisition of services but I am not familiar with specific initiatives. If confirmed, I will work with Air Force leaders to assess the state of services acquisitions.

Question. Do you agree that the Air Force should develop processes and systems to provide managers with access to information needed to conduct comprehensive spending analyses of Services contracts on an ongoing basis?

Answer. I agree in principle, as decisionmakers must have sound metrics that guide their decisionmaking throughout the life cycle a program, but I would need to better understand the current state before offering a specific view.

Question. The last decade has seen a proliferation of new types of government-wide contracts and multi-agency contracts. DOD is by far the largest ordering agency under these contracts, accounting for 85 percent of the dollars awarded under one of the largest programs. The DOD Inspector General (IG) and others have identified a long series of problems with interagency contracts, including lack of acquisition planning, inadequate competition, excessive use of time and materials contracts, improper use of expired funds, inappropriate expenditures, and failure to monitor contractor performance.

What steps, if any, do you believe the Air Force should take to ensure that its use of interagency contracts complies with applicable DOD requirements and is in the best interests of the Department?

Answer. If confirmed, I intend to dig more deeply into the analysis performed by the DOD IG and others or the specifics of their findings. If confirmed I would work with Air Force and DOD leaders to better understand the challenges associated with the implementation of interagency contracts, as well as the role and authorities of the Air Force in implementing them. I believe it is important to first understand the root causes of the challenges and the measures being implemented before offering any proposed solutions or corrective actions.

AIR FORCE ACQUISITION SYSTEM FLAWS

Question. Over the past several years, GAO protests have resulted in the reversal of a number of significant Air Force contract award decisions, including award decisions on the KC–X tanker replacement contract; the Combat Search and Rescue Helicopter Replacement Program (CSAR–X) contract; the C–130 Avionics Modernization Program (AMP) contract; the Small-Diameter Bomb contract; the Thunderbird video contract; and a contract for F–15 training simulators.

Do you believe that significant problems remain in the Air Force acquisition system today?

Answer. These reversals certainly point to problem areas. On the other hand, it is my understanding that the Air Force has made regaining acquisition excellence a top priority. I have seen strong evidence of this in its recent successes with the KC–46 Air Refueler, C–130J aircraft, Space Launch program and its rapid fielding of wartime capabilities, but this is an area that requires constant vigilance. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Air Force Service Acquisition Executive to address these three issues and to make the pursuit of acquisition excellence among the Service's highest priorities.

Question. If so, what are those problems and how would you propose to address them?

Answer. It is my understanding that there are three major themes coming from the GAO protests of these programs. First, resources and requirements match. Achieving a high level of technology maturity by the start of system development is an important indicator of whether this match has been made. This means that the technologies needed to meet essential product requirements have been demonstrated to work in their intended environment. In addition, the developer has completed a preliminary design of the product that shows the design is feasible. Second, product design is stable. This point occurs when a program determines that a product's design will meet customer requirements, as well as cost, schedule, and reliability targets. A best practice is to achieve design stability at the system-level critical design review, usually held midway through system development. Completion of at least 90 percent of engineering drawings at this point provides tangible evidence that the product's design is stable, and a prototype demonstration shows that the design is capable of meeting performance requirements. Third, manufacturing processes are mature. This point is achieved when it has been demonstrated that the developer can manufacture the product within cost, schedule, and quality targets. A best practice is to ensure that all critical manufacturing processes are in statistical control—that is, they are repeatable, sustainable, and capable of consistently producing parts within the product's quality tolerances and standards at the start of production. I can assure you that going forward I would apply the lessons learned from previous challenges and continue to pursue excellence within the acquisition portfolio.

Question. If not, why do you believe that the Air Force has been the subject of so many adverse bid protest decisions?

Answer. Not Applicable. See above answer.

EXPEDITIONARY COMBAT SUPPORT SYSTEM

Question. An Air Force Acquisition Incident Review (AIR) team recently completed a report on the failure of the Air Force's Expeditionary Combat Support System (ECSS). The AIR report discusses root causes for ECSS's failure and includes several recommendations.

Does the Air Force agree with the AIR team's findings?

Answer. It is my understanding that the Air Force is in agreement with the AIR Team's findings. Several root causes and contributing problems were identified spanning near-to-long-term corrective actions related to governance and how the Air Force structures its business IT programs for success. If confirmed, I would ensure that the Air Force applies the lessons learned in the findings to current and future initiatives.

Question. What is your understanding of the steps that the Air Force plans to take to implement the report's recommendations?

Answer. It is my understanding that Air Force senior leaders are following through on the recommendations of the report. This includes a review of existing major Air Force business systems based on the AIR Team's specific findings and lessons learned.

ENCROACHMENT ON MILITARY INSTALLATIONS

Question. Various Air Force Bases have encroachment issues, some of which are significant. These include population growth near military installations, environmental constraints on military training ranges, airspace restrictions to accommodate civilian airlines, and conflicts with civilian users over the use of radio frequency spectrum.

In your opinion, how serious are these problems for the Department of the Air Force?

Answer. I believe these problems are quite serious. As I understand it, the Air Force is proactively working with State and local communities to address current and potential encroachment issues.

Question. If confirmed, what policies or steps would you take to curtail the various encroachment issues?

Answer. It is my opinion that encroachment issues are best resolved at the lowest level. The Air Force instituted an Air Force Encroachment Management (AFEM) program that provides an overarching framework to address potential impacts to Air Force missions, safety, the environment and critical infrastructure. This framework is designed to identify issues at the installation-community level; elevate when appropriate through Major Commands; then to the Headquarters Air Force staff which further assesses potential impacts and recommends ways to resolve or mitigate. If confirmed, I will emphasize to our installation leaders they must continue to proactively engage with local community leaders so they are aware of Air Force mission needs and identify ways to retain or improve mission compatibility.

Question. If confirmed, what role do you expect to play in addressing these challenges?

Answer. For those issues that are identified and assessed as posing significant adverse impact to critical Air Force missions; local, State, DOD, and other agency stakeholders will be made aware and I will provide guidance as appropriate.

ENERGY CONSERVATION AND USE OF ALTERNATIVE FUELS

Question. In the past year, the Department of the Air Force has assumed a leadership role within the Federal Government for the advocacy, research, and testing of alternative fuels for use in military aircraft. In addition, the Air Force has encouraged proposals for the use of Federal property to construct refineries and power plants to include nuclear power.

In your view, which energy alternatives, to include fossil fuels, offer the greatest potential for benefit to Air Force programs and operations?

Answer. The Air Force needs to have assured access to reliable supplies of energy and the ability to protect and deliver sufficient energy to meet operational needs. Because of this, it is important for the Air Force to be flexible in the types of energy it can use and secure the quantities necessary to perform its missions, both for near-term benefits and long-term energy security. This flexibility is important for both weapon systems and installations.

Question. Do you support the goals adopted by the Air Force related to the increased use of alternative fuels? Does this include alternative fossil fuels?

Answer. In principle, I support the Air Force's goal to broadly pursue alternative fuels that are cost competitive with traditional petroleum-based jet fuels and that meet environmental and technical specifications. I look forward to digging into this area more deeply, if confirmed.

Question. In your opinion, what constraints does the Air Force face in carrying out initiatives to reduce reliance on fossil fuels?

Answer. I feel that the benefits of energy investments should be carefully weighed against the initial and recurring costs. Doing so will allow energy initiatives to be evaluated and appropriately funded along with other Air Force priorities in order to maximize the use of Air Force resources.

INVESTMENT IN FACILITIES

Question. Air Force leaders have stated in testimony, "MILCON is an essential enabler of Air Force missions; however, due to fiscal constraints, we must reduce funding and accept greater risk in facilities and infrastructure in order to continue our efforts to recapitalize and modernize our aging aircraft and equipment."

In your opinion, at what point is the reduction of funding for facilities and infrastructure too much of a risk for the Air Force?

Answer. I believe Air Force installations are the platforms from which we fly, fight, and win in air, space, and cyberspace. Therefore, it is critical to balance risk to facilities and infrastructure against mission readiness. If confirmed, I will ensure

Air Force leadership has the tools it needs to assess and mitigate risk to facilities and infrastructure, as well as airmen and mission, while ensuring we can deliver the decisive combat power this country expects.

Question. If confirmed, would you support goals established by DOD for certain levels of funding dedicated to the recapitalization and sustainment of facilities?

Answer. If confirmed, I would support DOD goals with respect to funding the recapitalization and sustainment of facilities. I fully understand, however, that in a fiscally constrained environment, the Air Force will have to continue to make challenging decisions to strike the right balance with respect to infrastructure requirements, readiness, and mission capability.

Question. What is your position on the use of public-private ventures to address critical deficiencies in family housing and utility infrastructure?

Answer. I have seen this approach work very well in some localities. If confirmed, I will evaluate any and all opportunities available to bring airmen and their families the exceptional housing and installation infrastructure they deserve.

LONG-RANGE BOMBERS

Question. The B–1s, B–2s, and B–52s will begin to be retired in the 2030 timeframe.

When do you believe that the United States needs to develop a new manned bomber?

Answer. I understand the new bomber is in the top 3 of Air Force modernization priorities. Given the aging bomber fleet and what I understand about the nature of the future threat environment it is important that the Air Force make the appropriate investments today to ensure a viable warfighting capability in the mid-2020 timeframe.

Question. Do you believe the Air Force needs to continue to manage the Long-Range Strike-Bomber Program as a special access program? If so, why?

Answer. It is my understanding that enhanced security is important to protecting critical technologies and capabilities.

Question. Do you believe that, regardless, it needs a reporting structure in content similar to the Selected Acquisition Reports?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will work with Air Force and DOD leaders to ensure the Service provides information on the Long-Range Strike-Bomber consistent with Selected Acquisition Reports at the Special Access Program level.

NRO AND THE AIR FORCE

Question. The responsibilities of the Director of the National Reconnaissance Office (NRO) were once included in the responsibilities of the Under Secretary of the Air Force. Dual-hatting the Under Secretary ensured that there was close cooperation between the NRO and the Air Force.

What steps would you take, if confirmed, to ensure that DOD space programs and NRO programs are managed in a coordinated fashion?

Answer. Currently there are various relationships and mechanisms in place that ensure DOD and NRO space programs are managed in a coordinated fashion. The Deputy Director of the NRO is an Air Force General Officer who in his role as the Commander, Air Force Element, manages all Air Force personnel and resources assigned to the NRO and serves as the senior adviser to the Director of the NRO on all military matters.

If confirmed, I would be dual hatted as the Executive Agent for Space and in that role would be responsible, in coordination with USD(I), for fostering a close working relationship between DOD and the Intelligence Community with regards to space programs. In the Secretary's role as the Executive Agent for Space I would also chair the Defense Space Council (DSC) where I would have the responsibility of achieving unity of effort across the DOD space enterprise. The National Reconnaissance Office is a member of the DSC while the Office of the Director of National Intelligence is also regularly represented. Other forums which meet several times a year, such as the Air Force/NASA/NRO Summit, reconfirm the mission interrelationships and foster collaboration and synchronization in areas of mutual interest. As the Secretary of the Air Force and the DOD Executive Agent for Space I intend to continue to use these and other forums to maintain a close relationship with the NRO and the Intelligence Community.

Question. The Air Force rotates personnel through the NRO, which has proven useful in developing synergy between space programs serving both intelligence and military needs. Proposals have been given to develop a core set of personnel at the NRO which maintains core service functions and maintains a long-term institutional memory and capability.

Would you support this proposal by putting a subset of Air Force personnel on a long-term basis at the NRO?

Answer. The Air Force has historically had a close working relationship with the NRO. If confirmed, I look forward to continuing this working relationship with rotations of Air Force personnel through the NRO. Overall it is important to create a cadre of space professionals with breadth of knowledge across mission areas balanced with technical depth and focused mission expertise as required. I also look forward to working with Air Force and NRO leadership to determine the best balance of meeting mission needs while developing a robust space professional cadre.

SPACE ACQUISITION

Question. If confirmed, how would you propose to ensure that the space acquisition process is successfully revamped to deliver future systems within promised costs and schedules?

Answer. Continuing to improve the space acquisition process is a priority for the Air Force and for the DOD. If confirmed, I will continue to support space acquisition process improvement, in the spirit of the Weapon System Acquisition Reform Act and in cooperation with the USD(AT&L).

Question. Milestone decision authority for space programs currently resides with the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology and Logistics. If confirmed will you seek to return this authority to the Air Force or are you comfortable with this authority residing with the Under Secretary?

Answer. I am unfamiliar with the background associated with the decision to place the milestone decision authority for space programs with the USD(AT&L). I do understand many of these capabilities exist to support national security objectives. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Under Secretary in managing and delivering space capabilities to the warfighter.

Question. The Air Force is developing a New Entrant strategy for medium and heavy launch of military and intelligence payloads. Do you support the NRO developing a separate new Entrant strategy different from what the Air Force is developing?

Answer. At this time, I am unfamiliar the specifics and current agreements associated with the Air Force and NRO new entrant strategies. If confirmed, I will make it a priority to understand the Air Force and NRO new entrant strategies, their differences and opportunities to partner together to ensure success in the Service and NRO missions.

AIR FORCE SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question. What metrics will you use to assess the effectiveness of the Air Force science and technology programs?

Answer. I understand the Air Force Scientific Advisory Board (SAB) conducts in-depth reviews of the Air Force Research Laboratory's science and technology portfolio. If confirmed I will consult with the SAB to learn more about their ratings and seek their advice to help guide and improve the effectiveness of our Air Force science and technology programs.

Question. What metrics will you use to assess the effectiveness of the Air Force's basic research programs?

Answer. If confirmed, I would make it a priority to identify, nurture and harvest the best basic research to transform leading-edge scientific discoveries into new technologies with substantial military potential. Combined with this focus I would ensure the appropriate effectiveness metrics are in place.

Question. Do you believe the current balance between short- and long-term research is appropriate to meet current and future Air Force needs?

Answer. At this time, I am unfamiliar with the specifics of the Air Force's investment balance between short- and long-term research. If confirmed I look forward to assessing the Air Force's Science and Technology (S&T) Program investments to attain a balance between near-term quick-reaction capabilities; mid-term modernization technologies and long-term revolutionary technologies.

Question. What metrics will you use to assess the adequacy of investment levels in Air Force science and technology programs?

Answer. At this time, I am unfamiliar with the Air Force's investment levels in Air Force science and technology programs or the metrics used to assess the adequacy of those investments. If confirmed I would make it a priority to execute a balanced, integrated S&T program that supports the current fight while advancing breakthrough S&T for tomorrow's fight, ensuring adequate funding in basic research and the right level of investment to mature technologies for transition into acquisition programs.

Question. What role do investments in science and technology play in reducing costs and technical risk of acquisition programs?

Answer. It is my understanding that Air Force investments in science and technology leverage research and development efforts within academia and industry, including small businesses and government laboratories, all of which help lower risk in Air Force acquisition programs.

TEST AND EVALUATION

Question. What are your views on the effectiveness of the Air Force's test and evaluation activities?

Answer. I am not yet able to assess the effectiveness of the Air Force's Test and Evaluation (T&E) activities, but if confirmed, I would be committed to a sustaining a vibrant test and evaluation program. This capability is crucial to Air Force acquisition programs, tactics, techniques and procedures development, and assessing the combat capability of forces.

Question. What are the major weaknesses and deficiencies with the Air Force test and evaluation enterprise in meeting current and emerging Air Force testing requirements?

Answer. I am not in a position to assess major weaknesses and deficiencies in the Air Force T&E enterprise at this time. If confirmed, I will work with Air Force and DOD leadership to ensure the Air Force is prepared for current and emerging test and evaluation requirements.

Question. The Air Force has recently contemplated a number of steps to reorganize both development and operational test activities. Some of these proposals included significant government and contractor workforce reductions and potential closures of test assets.

If confirmed, what actions would you take to ensure that any reorganizations or closure of test assets or reductions in test workforce result in actual cost reductions and do not entail undue risk to Air Force or other DOD current or future acquisition programs?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the acquisition and T&E communities to establish a formal relationship between modernization priorities and T&E resources, so that the Air Force has a logical, defensible T&E program to fully support the needs of our highest priority acquisitions.

Question. What is your view of the role of the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation (DOT&E), the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (DASD(DT&E)), Developmental Test and Evaluation and the Director of the Test Resource Management Center (TRMC) in ensuring that such reductions do not undermine the ability of the Air Force to carry out needed test programs?

Answer. It is my understanding that the DASD(DT&E) and the Director, TRMC for developmental testing, and DOT&E for operational testing, play an important role in ensuring the Air Force T&E program is responsive to the needs for Developmental and Operational Testing (DT and OT) for the Department's oversight acquisition programs. If confirmed, I will work closely with these oversight organizations to ensure the Air Force provides all of the support necessary to ensure successful DT and OT for acquisition programs.

Question. The Air Force has some unique requirements with regard to prompt global reach and affordable, responsive space lift missions.

In your view, are changes in current test range structure, operations, and mission assurance parameters required to accommodate Air Force experimentation and small launch needs?

Answer. I am not familiar with this area at this time. If confirmed, I will evaluate launch ranges with respect to the Air Force's experimentation and small launch needs.

AIR FORCE RESEARCH LABORATORIES

Question. What are the major challenges facing the Air Force Research Laboratory?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to learning more about specific Air Force Research Laboratory challenges and providing my leadership to help overcome them.

Question. How do you plan to address these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I will actively work with Science and Technology and Laboratory leadership to address challenges and encourage continued innovation.

Question. Are you supportive of efforts of the Air Force Research Laboratory to expand and enhance their unique laboratory personnel demonstration program to ensure that they can attract and retain the finest technical workforce?

Answer. Yes. While I am not aware of the specifics of the Lab Demonstration Program, from past experiences it is clear the Air Force Research Laboratory operates in a very competitive market for highly-qualified scientist, technologist, engineer, and mathematician (STEM) talent. With domestic and international competition for people with these skills intensifying, I support efforts to actively attract and retain STEM talent.

AIRBORNE INTELLIGENCE, SURVEILLANCE, AND RECONNAISSANCE

Question. The airborne intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR) assets developed and operated by the Air Force form an indispensable part of the Nation's overall intelligence architecture. These assets are often referred to as high demand, low density systems because of the extensive number of requirements and high operational tempo on their systems and crews.

In your view, does the Air Force have sufficient airborne ISR assets to meet current and projected requirements?

Answer. My understanding is there are not enough assets to meet all the requests of the combatant commanders (COCOMs). However, the Air Force meets the highest priority demands.

Question. What changes would you recommend, if confirmed, to current plans for the development and acquisition of airborne ISR platforms? Will these changes remove ISR platforms from the "high-demand, low-density" category?

Answer. In this fiscal environment, my goal would be to ensure we maintain our ISR capabilities to provide decisive advantages to COCOMs. I would also enhance, if fiscally possible, our current ISR capabilities with advanced technologies and improved interoperability between existing ISR systems, to include those in the joint arena, to ensure our ISR dominance. However, it still may not be possible to satisfy all COCOM ISR demands.

U.S. AFRICA COMMAND

Question. On numerous occasions, the committee has expressed concern that the Commander of U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM) lacks the necessary air support to execute effectively his mission in a continent comprised of 53 countries, spanning a geographic area larger than the United States, China, and Western Europe combined. The Commander of AFRICOM recently indicated before the Air Force Defense Strategy Seminar this shortage of aircraft remains.

If confirmed, what would you do to support AFRICOM, given the demand on existing assets within other geographic combatant command AORs?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to working closely with AFRICOM and the other combatant commanders to ensure requirements are met.

The demands for airpower are likely to continue to exceed the resources available. The requirements of each combatant commander are adjudicated through what I understand to be a fair and consistent process based on national priorities.

NUCLEAR MATTERS

Question. Based on the 2007 Minot incident, Air Force has exhaustively studied and made strong organizational changes to its management of the nuclear weapons it is charged with maintaining and deploying.

What will you do to strengthen the nuclear programs at the Air Force Weapons School for airmen who choose a long-term career to maintain and deploy nuclear weapons beyond the few that currently attend it?

Answer. The nuclear mission is vital to the Air Force and the Nation and we cannot succeed in it without highly trained personnel. If confirmed, I will explore ways to strengthen the nuclear programs at the Air Force Weapons School. Additionally, I look forward to visiting the Intercontinental Ballistic Missile Weapons Squadron in the near future.

Question. The Air Force is the primary maintainer and implementer of the Nuclear Command, Control and Communications (NC3) System. This NC3 system is aging, yet it is vitally important to ensuring the President has direct control over nuclear weapons and their use. The cost overruns and failure in deploying the Family of Beyond Line of Sight Terminals (FAB–T) on nuclear capable airborne delivery platforms reflects poorly on the Air Force's first foray with a new generation of NC3 acquisition programs.

What actions will you take to ensure the FAB–T acquisition program corrects its cost over runs and eventually is deployed on airborne platforms?

Answer. Strengthening the Nuclear Enterprise is a top Air Force priority. I also understand that NC3 systems are important to the effectiveness of that mission. If confirmed, I look forward to working with Air Force leaders to learn more about FAB–T and other NC3 acquisition programs and to ensure that they are properly executed in this tight fiscal environment.

Question. What actions will you take to ensure there is a long-term road map and acquisition strategy to ensure the NC3 system meets requirements consistent with the President's recent Nuclear Employment Strategy?

Answer. I understand the Air Force is currently working with DOD in support of its effort to develop an NC3 architecture to support the President's recently updated nuclear employment strategy. Once finalized, the Air Force will develop an Air Force specific roadmap that supports the new architecture. In the meantime, the Air Force is refining a NC3 Sustainment Roadmap to provide a more comprehensive approach to sustaining current Air Force NC3 systems.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic communications, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MARK UDALL

AIR FORCE MODERNIZATION

1. Senator UDALL. Ms. James, you mentioned in your advance policy questions that one of your priorities is to balance today's readiness with tomorrow's modernization needs. Would you expand on some of the ways you'd propose to achieve that balance?

Ms. JAMES. I am concerned about today's readiness and believe we need to reinvest in this area to make up for the impacts of fiscal year 2013 sequestration. Keeping a ready force today is essential to ensure the Air Force can answer the call. At the same time, I believe the Air Force should continue its long-term recapitalization effort with an emphasis on developing the capabilities the Service uniquely provides to the Joint Force; such as, global/long-range and non-permissive capabilities, exemplified in the F–35, Long-Range Strike Bomber, and KC–46A programs.

2. Senator UDALL. Ms. James, what do you see as the Air Force's core missions—and are there any missions or systems that you believe the Air Force should divest?

Ms. JAMES. Airmen bring to the Nation's military portfolio, five interdependent and integrated core missions that have endured since President Truman originally assigned airpower roles and missions to the Air Force in 1947. These are: air and space superiority; intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance; rapid global mobility; global strike; and command and control. although the way the Air Force performs these mission swill constantly evolve, the Air Force will continue to perform these missions so that our military can respond quickly and appropriately o unpredictable threats and challenges. If confirmed, I will carefully review all systems.

AIR FORCE SPACE SYSTEMS

3. Senator UDALL. Ms. James, for fiscal year 2013 the administration proposed terminating the Operationally Responsive Space program, which the Senate Armed Services Committee (SASC) rejected. In fiscal year 2014, the administration again proposed to terminate the office and once again, SASC rejected this proposal. I understand that we are in a stark fiscal crisis but I hope the Air Force takes into account that this office is the one that first proposed low cost, quick to build satellite coupled with a low cost launch. If confirmed, I want you to realize that from the SASC perspective it does not look good to terminate one of the few programs that may actually reduce the cost of space systems in a time of sequestration. Will you commit to re-examine any such proposals for fiscal year 2015?

Ms. JAMES. Yes, I give you this commitment, if confirmed.

4. Senator UDALL. Ms. James, General Shelton has mentioned previously to the Strategic Forces Subcommittee that space systems and ground systems are usually contracted for and managed separately. This has resulted in disconnects between two programs that should be fully integrated. As we look to reduce costs and redundancies, will you agree to take a hard look at how we do space acquisition in order to achieve savings and speed up delivery?

Ms. JAMES. Yes. Although I am not familiar with General Shelton's comments, I believe that continuing to improve the space acquisition process is a priority for the Air force and for the Department of Defense (DOD).

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KAY R. HAGAN

FUTURE SCIENTISTS AND ENGINEERS FOR DOD AND THE DEFENSE INDUSTRY

5. Senator HAGAN. Ms. James, DOD and the defense industry are facing challenges seeking new graduates with advanced degrees in scientific and technical fields to help develop complex military systems. Some of these challenges include a lack of interest in traditional defense sectors by new graduates, Federal hiring issues, budget pressure, the length that typical defense programs take to execute, and competition for talent with other government agencies. If confirmed, what would you do to ensure that DOD has access to the best and brightest future scientific and technical talent?

Ms. JAMES. I have been made aware of the science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM) workforce challenges facing our Nation and particularly the U.S. Air Force. If confirmed, I will convey to airmen the need to improve technical skills and do my best to inspire youth to pursue STEM disciplines and an Air Force career.

It's my understanding that the former Air Force Secretary and Chief signed an Air Force STEM Workforce Strategic Roadmap called Bright Horizons and that the Air Force is currently updating that document to capture progress made and new initiatives. If confirmed, I plan to review the Air Force's updated plan and ensure the Service implements a STEM Roadmap which optimizes its scientific and technical skills base.

6. Senator HAGAN. Ms. James, how would you measure the effectiveness of these efforts?

Ms. JAMES. I understand that the Air Force tracks the number of publications accomplished linked to research funding, as well as students supported by our funding outreach activities. If confirmed, I will make sure such measurements continue so as to drive business behaviors across the Air Force that are consistent with the vision and goals of the updated Air Force STEM Workforce Strategic Roadmap.

MODULAR AIRBORNE FIRE FIGHTING SYSTEM

7. Senator HAGAN. Ms. James, the Air Guard and the Air Force Reserve have been successfully flying and controlling the Modular Airborne Fire Fighting System (MAFFS) mission to combat wildfires for over 40 years. One reason this mission is so successful is the fact that Reserve component personnel have had the opportunity to volunteer in a variety of statuses, most importantly under title 32. However, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Homeland Defense (and his deputy) are now attempting to make MAFFS a title 10 mission, not a title 32 502(f) status National Guard controlled mission, even if/when a Dual Status Commander is available for 2014. This would bring numerous negative personnel issues and command and control issues, possibly compromising the mission. All three States that fly MAFFS: North Carolina, Wyoming, and California, and the National Guard Association oppose this move as needlessly restrictive. Seeing as the National Guard has been flying and controlling this mission for 40 years and the Air Force has determined

MAFFS is best suited for the Reserve component, will you support continuing the use of title 32 as the primary duty status for the MAFFS mission?

Ms. JAMES. I am not familiar with this program. However, if confirmed I will work closely with the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Homeland Defense and America's Security Affairs to resolve the personnel and command and control issues to ensure Air Reserve component airmen have the flexibility and proper authority to support the MAFFS mission.

INFORMATION SUPPORT SQUADRONS

8. Senator HAGAN. Ms. James, with the constant threat of cyber attacks upon governmental organizations and commercial enterprises, there is a high demand for personnel with the training and experience to successfully protect our Nation's secrets and infrastructure. This demand leads to a very competitive market for such expertise, a market in which the playing field is certainly not level for Government agencies, such as DOD, in terms of matching compensation with civilian competitors. But there is one positive option for DOD in attracting and retaining such personnel, and that is with the National Guard, where its servicemembers can aspire to have a civilian career while simultaneously serving one's country. In this environment, will you support the placement of Information Support Squadrons for cyber operations within the National Guard?

Ms. JAMES. As a general principle, I believe Guard and Reserve personnel in our Total Force bring cyber expertise from private industry that is critical to our Nation's and Air Force cyber operations. The 262nd Network Warfare Squadron, a guard squadron supporting the Active 688th Cyberspace Wing, is an example of an Air National Guard (ANG) unit that is one of our Air Force's premier cyber operations squadrons made up of personnel who work in the commercial IT industry and also serve as a guardsman. I will explore the opportunity of doing more, if confirmed.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KIRSTEN E. GILLIBRAND

MENTAL HEALTH

9. Senator GILLIBRAND. Ms. James, if confirmed, what will you do to ensure the Air Force is providing appropriate mental health care to airmen and their families?

Ms. JAMES. The Air Force's focus is on provision of quality and timely mental health support for airmen and their families. This same support extends to all military servicemembers and families wherever they are supported by Air Force hospitals and clinics. Meeting the operational mental health needs of our servicemembers will be one of my top priorities. I will ensure integration of mental health support with our community partners to identify sources of stress and help reduce the impacts of stress to promote health and family wellness. I will place strong emphasis on a tightly coordinated program of mental health support between the three military medical services, the TRICARE network, and the Department of Veterans Affairs to provide a full scope of mental health services for our airmen and their families.

CYBER

10. Senator GILLIBRAND. Ms. James, the Air Force is scheduled to add more than 1,000 cyber professionals between fiscal years 2014 and 2016. In light of sequestration and current budgetary constraints do you foresee being able to meet these goals?

Ms. JAMES. I certainly hope so, as I believe this to be an important area. However, the Air Force could face significant challenges depending on the outcome of budget deliberations and whether there is a Continuing Resolution or full appropriation in fiscal year 2014.

11. Senator GILLIBRAND. Ms. James, do you see room for cost savings in using more of the National Guard and Reserves to build your cyber force?

Ms. JAMES. The cyber mission strikes me as a good one for the National Guard and Reserve. If confirmed, I will delve into this more deeply. I also would like to explore ways to better identify new recruits who may have a particular aptitude for the cyber mission. Finally, it may be appropriate to target bonuses and advertising resources to this career area.

12. Senator GILLIBRAND. Ms. James, the cyber field is a fast-paced, ever-changing arena. If confirmed, what steps will you take to ensure we are recruiting the best and the brightest to this field?

Ms. JAMES. I am aware the Air Force advocates and supports cyberspace and computer training and education programs nationwide to encourage high school and college students towards technical career fields. This strikes me as a good start. I look forward to working on this area, if confirmed.

13. Senator GILLIBRAND. Ms. James, what authorities will be needed to keep the U.S. military on the cutting edge of cyber?

Ms. JAMES. I am not aware of any current gaps in authorities; however, if confirmed, I will need to review this area fully.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MAZIE K. HIRONO

READINESS

14. Senator HIRONO. Ms. James, what are the impacts of sequestration on recruitment and retention for the uniformed military?

Ms. JAMES. I don't have the exact figures, and it may be too early to tell, but I would expect some adverse impacts to Air Force recruiting in light of budget cuts to advertising, marketing and outreach programs.

15. Senator HIRONO. Ms. James, for our valued civil servants in DOD, the furloughs have created difficult situations for many. What are the impacts on recruitment and retention of our civil service employees?

Ms. JAMES. I believe the most significant immediate impact of furlough has been on morale of the workforce. I also understand the Air Force expects a surge in retirements that could lead to one of the largest retirement years in recent memory. Furloughs, continued pay freezes, and reductions in force could have long-term effects on the workforce and recruitment if future furloughs occur.

REBALANCE TO THE PACIFIC

16. Senator HIRONO. Ms. James, the Air Force will continue to play a significant role within the U.S. Pacific Command team as we move forward with the Pacific rebalance. What is your view of the Air Force's role in the future?

Ms. JAMES. The U.S. Air Force will rebalance toward the Asia-Pacific region in conjunction with other regional and global commitments. The Air Force will continue to play a vital role in securing U.S. economic and security interests in the Pacific region. Specifically, the preservation of peace, stability, and the free flow of commerce in the Pacific region will be a top U.S. priority.

17. Senator HIRONO. Ms. James, how important will total force integration be to continue and where possible expand the partnership between the Active Duty and Reserve components?

Ms. JAMES. Total Force Integration is essential to reinforce the interdependencies between Active and Reserve components of the Air Force. Collaboration between Air Force leadership from both the Active and Reserve components is and will remain vital to building a Total Force Air Force that delivers air, space, and cyber power that the Nation and the joint force have come to expect from our Air Force; this is especially true in an environment of decreasing resources.

COMMAND CLIMATE

18. Senator HIRONO. Ms. James, a command climate survey can go a long way in determining how effective a unit is and whether or not negative actions such as sexual harassment are tolerated and/or reported. What is your opinion of the current climate surveys?

Ms. JAMES. I understand that the Air Force Climate Survey is conducted biennially and, if confirmed, the results will be briefed to me and released to the units. Commanders with 10 or more respondents are provided survey results along with a guide containing specific recommendations and lists of resources to improve their unit climate. If confirmed, I will review the survey more fully to see if there are needed improvements.

19. Senator HIRONO. Ms. James, should climate surveys be kept to monitor potential long-term issues?

Ms. JAMES. I believe so. Unit Climate Assessments are essential to monitoring the engagement of the organization, and electronic copies of organizational climate surveys are maintained by the Equal Opportunity Office. Additionally, climate surveys should be maintained by commanders to monitor trends, to track progress on recommended actions, and to address long-term issues which cannot be promptly resolved. Commanders are encouraged to pass climate survey results to incoming commanders to ensure continuity on long-term issues.

20. Senator HIRONO. Ms. James, should climate surveys be tied to the commander's permanent personnel records so as to monitor performance as a leader? What about other assessments such as 360 evaluations?

Ms. JAMES. I am very interested in tying climate surveys to performance reviews and I am told DOD is currently evaluating the methods used to assess the performance of military commanders for establishing command climates of dignity and respect and incorporating Sexual Assault Prevention and Response into their commands to ensure standardization across the Services.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

AIR FORCE READINESS

21. Senator INHOFE. Ms. James, what are your thoughts on tiered readiness and the ability of the Air Force to meet combatant commander (COCOM) requirements, maintain overall readiness, and the impact to morale and retention of personal?

Ms. JAMES. According to the briefings I have received so far, I am told the Air Force cannot maintain a tiered-readiness posture and still meet the current defense guidance. That said, the Air Force may have reached a point where large force structure cannot be sustained at requisite readiness levels while also preserving critical modernization programs needed for the future. This is a very difficult problem to resolve going forward and one that I will need to study carefully, if confirmed.

22. Senator INHOFE. Ms. James, based on current and projected readiness levels of the Air Force, do you believe the Air Force can meet current COCOM Operational Plan requirements? You may provide a classified answer for the record if you chose.

Ms. JAMES. The Chief of Staff stated in a September 16 interview with Air Force Times, "There is not a mission that the Nation could ask that the Air Force would not be capable of doing." I believe this statement is accurate. However, I am concerned that if readiness is lessened the Air Force may have to perform missions with greater risk, and I prefer this not happen.

23. Senator INHOFE. Ms. James, depot maintenance has been delayed on our aircraft—equipment that is on average over 20 years old and worn down by over a decade of war. Based on your experience both in DOD and out in industry, how does this impact the readiness and safety of the Air Force?

Ms. JAMES. Based on my experience, I believe the impacts caused by fiscal year 2013 reduction in depot maintenance will likely impact future aircraft availability/sortie generation rates, thereby negatively affecting overall readiness recovery efforts. The depot recovery from sequestration will likely require a multi-year effort and additional funding to halt the decline in aircraft availability.

Regarding safety, I know the Air Force considers safety a top priority in all operations and strives to mitigate and manage risk.

24. Senator INHOFE. Ms. James, has DOD budgeted additional money in fiscal year 2014 to pay for delayed fiscal year 2013 Air Force depot maintenance?

Ms. JAMES. My understanding is the Air Force has not budgeted additional money in fiscal year 2014 to pay for delayed fiscal year 2013 depot maintenance requirements. The delayed requirements have been added to the overall 2014 depot maintenance program and will be prioritized against the remaining weapon system sustainment portfolio to best maximize warfighter readiness based on available fiscal resources.

25. Senator INHOFE. Ms. James, what is your assessment of the F–35 program as it is executing today based on budget and schedule?

Ms. JAMES. It is my understanding that the program went through a technical baseline review a few years ago and since then has been tracking well to its planned schedule baseline. It has been reported that the recent Low Rate Initial Production contract awards have resulted in reductions to air vehicle costs. Based upon that, it would seem the program should be executing below cost. Efforts to address technical issues and life cycle costs are encouraging, but I understand that software remains a watch-item. Additionally, I'm aware that the DOD Inspector General conducted a quality assurance assessment on the program. In their report, they assessed the Government's oversight of the contractor as inadequate and ineffective which is a concern to me. If confirmed, I look forward to reviewing the program to see firsthand how well it is executing to its cost, schedule, and technical performance baselines.

26. Senator INHOFE. Ms. James, is the F–35 needed to meet U.S. national security requirements?

Ms. JAMES. Yes. The F–35 represents the future of the Air Force fighter fleet. It will provide critical capabilities required to accomplish Air Force missions in the threat environment of the future, and enables true Joint and Coalition operations. The air superiority this Nation has enjoyed for 60 years is not an accident and gaining and maintaining it is not easy. It requires trained proficient and ready airmen and it requires credible, capable and technologically superior aircraft. The F–35 is essential to ensuring we can provide that air superiority in the future.

27. Senator INHOFE. Ms. James, what is the impact if the United States cuts the number of F–35s it plans to procure?

Ms. JAMES. It is my understanding that a cut in the procurement of F–35s will increase the per-unit cost. Therefore, the impact to the overall cost will depend upon the final number of aircraft to be procured.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SAXBY CHAMBLISS

SMALL BUSINESS CONTRACTS

28. Senator CHAMBLISS. Ms. James, while I appreciate and support the objectives and intent of the Small Business Act, I am concerned that often the requirement to reach a small business percentage goal outweighs the requirement to produce the most effective products and services for our warfighters. This goal to achieve a certain percentage quota for small businesses can lead to inappropriate pressure being brought to bear on defense contracting officers to make decisions which result in the government buying a product or service at higher total procurement cost.

In some instances, these pressures are contrary to existing provisions of the Federal Acquisition Regulations (FAR) that contain specific exceptions allowing contracting officers' greater flexibility for specified contract tasks. Unfortunately, I am aware of cases in which these exceptions are not considered or are improperly excluded during the contract review process.

In particular, FAR 6.302.3 (Exception 3) applies specifically to engineering, research, or development capabilities that are provided to the Government by an educational or other nonprofit institution or a Federally Funded Research and Development Center. These contracts do not compete with large or small businesses and are well-recognized by the Air Force as providing unique capabilities at very low costs. Often, these Exception 3 contracts deliver a work product that is itself used to generate contract solicitations for small businesses.

In this climate of tight budgets, the Air Force must take full advantage of the best products or services at lower costs. University research, engineering, or development centers which are non-profit can provide these lower costs with greater continuity in expertise, unbiased analysis, along with advanced academic training. The Air Force has long acknowledged that we must improve the training available to both current and future government employees so that they will be better prepared to do their jobs. That is another reason that the Exception 3 academic component is part of the FAR provisions.

To this end, the Air Force should establish a plan in which contracts awarded under a valid FAR Exception 3 are not counted against the percentage of total awards made to small businesses when determining small business set-aside, award goals.

Furthermore, the Secretary of the Air Force, through the Small Business Programs office, should immediately direct local Air Force commands to educate, emphasize, and enforce the intent of FAR exceptions and make it clear to both local Procurement Contracting Officers and Small Business Offices that valid FAR 6.302 Exception 3 contracts are not subject to Small Business disapproval because they are viewed as detracting from small business contracting goals.

If confirmed, do you believe that you can create a system where awards made under a FAR Subpart 6.302 Exceptions 3 will not count against Air Force small business percentage goals?

Ms. JAMES. As I understand it, the methodology for what is or is not counted in the Small Business Goaling percentage is established by the Small Business Act and its implementing regulations and policies. The type of action you propose may require a change in legislation (i.e., Small Business Act). If confirmed, I will look into the issue more closely.

29. Senator CHAMBLISS. Ms. James, if confirmed, will you and your Small Business Programs office, in the next 90 days, work directly with my staff to craft a solution that ensures the Air Force will actively enforce the intent of FAR 6.302 Exceptions 3 so that we are not excluding a valid process that results in lower total procurement costs?

Ms. JAMES. If confirmed, I will look into FAR 6.302–3 sole source exceptions to ensure processes are being followed according to all laws and regulations.

30. Senator CHAMBLISS. Ms. James, within 180 days, will you establish a Service-wide directive where awards made under FAR 6.302 Exception 3 are not subject to local Small Business office review for approval and allocation to small business contracting quotas if this valid exception is considered to be in the best interest of the Government as determined by the Government requirements and procurement personnel?

Ms. JAMES. I will certainly review the policies under the Small Business Act, Section 8, 15, and 31 and FAR 19.402 and consult with the Small Business Administration regarding their statutory and regulatory policies on this issue.

31. Senator CHAMBLISS. Ms. James, in accordance with FAR 19.702, since subcontracting plans are required for solicitations greater than $650,000 ($1.5 million for construction), and because prime contractors are required to electronically submit subcontractor reports (SF 294 and SF 295) after award, will the Air Force include dollar totals from these subcontractor reports towards the small business goals since the subcontracts are also federally funded and the data is already available?

Ms. JAMES. As I understand it, IAW FAR 19.702, they will count towards the Subcontracting Goals.

A–10 WARTHOG

32. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, has the Air Force made the decision to divest A–10s from the Air Force inventory?

Ms. JAMES. To the best of my knowledge, no final decisions have been made. This question is predecisonal (and I am not privy to predecisional matters).

33. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, has General Welsh signed the fiscal year 2015 program objective memorandum (POM) and does it call for the divestment of A–10s by 2015?

Ms. JAMES. I don't know. However, I do know that Air Force budget decisions are not final at this point, as they have yet to go through the full process.

34. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, is the divestment of the A–10 primarily a budget-driven decision or does the Air Force believe the A–10 is no longer needed for the close air support mission? If the Air Force believes the A–10 is no longer needed, please provide a detailed justification.

Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on the fiscal year 2015 POM, but it my understanding there are other weapon systems in the Air Force inventory that provide capabilities similar to that of the A–10. If confirmed, I will explore the matter thoroughly.

35. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, does the Air Force believe it will need congressional authority or appropriations to divest A–10s?

Ms. JAMES. Any Air Force divestiture proposals will be forwarded as part of the President's budget for congressional consideration. If confirmed, I will take no action on fleet divestures without consulting all stakeholders.

36. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, have the Army and Marine Corps provided an opinion to the Air Force on any potential plan to divest the A–10s?
Ms. JAMES. I don't know. However, the normal process would be for the Air Force to brief the Army and Marine Corps as well as the other DOD components on the Air Force's fiscal year 2015 budget recommendations. Additionally, DOD leads an extensive review of each Service's budget proposals as part of the annual Program Budget Review. This process has not yet fully played out.

37. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, has the Army expressed a desire to maintain and operate the A–10?
Ms. JAMES. I don't know. Personally, I have not communicated with the Army about this program.

38. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, how does the Air Force plan to replace the capabilities that will be lost if the A–10 is divested by fiscal year 2015?
Ms. JAMES. I am told that the A–10 capabilities already exist on multi-role platforms. The evolution of targeting pods, precision-guided munitions, and the refinement of tactics, techniques, and procedures have enabled other platforms to provide the capabilities once considered unique to the A–10. I will delve into this more deeply if confirmed.

39. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, how does the Air Force plan to replace the A–10s role in close air support, combat search and rescue (CSAR) support, strike coordination and reconnaissance (SCAR), and as a forward air controller (airborne)?
Ms. JAMES. I am told that these missions are already accomplished using multiple aircraft in the Air Force inventory. Multi-role fighter platforms already perform most of these missions. I agree that this is a critical question to review more thoroughly if confirmed.

40. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, if the A–10 is divested, does the Air Force anticipate a degradation of capability in any of these areas?
Ms. JAMES. If the A–10 is divested, it will be critical that these capabilities be provided through alternate means. I would be committed to this if confirmed.

41. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, what would be the timeline for A–10 divestments?
Ms. JAMES. I do not have any information on this.

42. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, will F–35s come into the inventory at the same rate or faster than A–10s would be divested?
Ms. JAMES. I don't know.

43. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, are Air Force F–35 pilots receiving formal training for the following missions: close air support, CSAR support, Special Operations Forces support, air interdiction, armed reconnaissance, forward air controller (airborne), non-traditional intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance, and SCAR?
Ms. JAMES. My understanding is that pilots either are, or will be trained, in all these areas.

44. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, has the Air Force developed plans to end or curtail A–10 pilot training?
Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on this.

45. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, is the Air Force curtailing A–10 pilot training in fiscal year 2014? If so, how?
Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on this area.

46. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, would all bases that lose the A–10 receive a new airframe? If not, which bases will not receive replacement airframes?
Ms. JAMES. I have no information on this.

47. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, which operations plans (OPLANS) explicitly call for the use of A–10s and how will these OPLANS be supported without the A–10? (a classified response is acceptable)

Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on classified matters. I can provide, if confirmed.

48. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, has the Air Force sought the formal opinions of COCOMs regarding the potential divestment of the A–10?
Ms. JAMES. I do not know specifically, but if not, it should be part of the normal process.

49. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, what have COCOMs said?
Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on this.

50. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, have they expressed concerns about the ability to support OPLANs?
Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on classified matters.

51. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, will every A–10 removed from South Korea be replaced by an F–35?
Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on this.

52. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, in South Korea, would there be any gap between the removal of A–10s and their replacement with F–35s?
Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on this.

53. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, what are the strategic assumptions that are guiding the Air Force's decision to potentially divest the A–10?
Ms. JAMES. My understanding is that the Air Force is looking to achieve savings where possible in single mission aircraft when multi-mission aircraft can fulfill that mission.

54. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, how has the A–10 performed in Afghanistan?
Ms. JAMES. As far as I know, the A–10 performed superbly in Afghanistan.

55. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, how did the A–10 perform in Iraq?
Ms. JAMES. Superbly, to the best of my knowledge.

56. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, what is the best Air Force close air support platform in Afghanistan?
Ms. JAMES. I don't have information on this, but I have been briefed that the following additional aircraft provide close air support in Afghanistan: F–15E, F–16, B–1, B–52, AC–130.

57. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, how much does it cost to operate and maintain the current fleet of A–10s?
Ms. JAMES. I am told that in fiscal year 2012, the Air Force owned 346 A–10C aircraft that flew a total of 101.6K hours. The associated operational costs were $1.8 billion (based on Air Force Total Ownership Cost fiscal year 1303 data).

58. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, what is the potential Future Years Defense Program (FYDP) savings associated with divesting the A–10 fleet?
Ms. JAMES. I have not received any FYDP briefings.

59. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, what is the FYDP savings associated with divesting only the Active Duty A–10s while maintaining all the ANG/Air Force Reserves (AFRES) A–10 fleet?
Ms. JAMES. I don't know.

60. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, how does the planned A–10 Programmed Flying Training (PFT) for fiscal year 2014 compare to the PFT in fiscal year 2013? How does this change compare with other aircraft?
Ms. JAMES. My understanding is that the fiscal year 2014 A–10C PFT is reduced 18 percent from the fiscal year 2013 levels. The Air Force has explained to me that this is a result of the fiscal year 2013 National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration-directed conversion of a Formal Training Unit (FTU) squadron to Air Force Reserve component and flying hour reductions associated with current fiscal challenges. Apparently, while other FTUs may have seen small flying hour reductions, no other FTUs are showing a noticeable difference in production between fiscal year 2013 and fiscal year 2014.

61. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, when has Headquarters (HQ) Air Combat Command (ACC) directed that the last scheduled Active Duty A–10 FTU "B Course" to occur? Please provide start and end dates.

Ms. JAMES. Based on my understanding, A–10 B-courses are still funded and planned.

62. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, has HQ ACC canceled any Active Duty B Courses programmed for fiscal year 2014?

Ms. JAMES. To the best of my knowledge—no.

63. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, is the Air Force still assigning new pilots to A–10 formal training and operational units?

Ms. JAMES. As I understand it, the Air Force is still assigning new pilots to the A–10.

64. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, when does the Air Force assignment system currently project the last A–10 pilots will enter formal training?

Ms. JAMES. Logically speaking, it would seem that the Air Force would only cease A–10 B-course training if the A–10 fleet is to be removed from the inventory.

65. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, is the Air Force maintaining the health of the A–10 fleet commensurate with other major weapons systems in terms of personnel flow, and logistics, and operations and maintenance (O&M) funding? Please include a side-by-side comparison with other major weapons systems.

Ms. JAMES. As I understand, yes. A–10 funding levels and aircraft availability (AA) rates are commensurate with other legacy fighter/attack weapon systems. However, the A–10 manning levels decreased approximately 10 percent from fiscal year 2010 to fiscal year 2012. This is partly due to the closing of the A–10 squadron at Spangdahlem AB, Germany. Overall, the health of the A–10 fleet, in terms of AA, improved from fiscal year 2010–2012. Total O&M costs less MILPERS are included in the comparison below.

	FY2010		FY2011		FY2012
	O&M Costs	AA Rates	O&M Costs	AA Rates	O&M Costs	AA Rates
A-10	~$1.2B	53.97%	~$1.2B	58.58%	~$1.1B	66.52%
F-15E	~$1.4B	63.18%	~$1.3B	66.70%	~$1.3B	69.80%
F-16C/D*	~$3.3B	65.54%	~$3.3B	63.90%	~$3.1B	64.42%

Note: A-10, F-15E and F-16C/D figures are Total Force.

 F-16C/D fleet is approximately 3 to 4 times the size of the A-10 and F-15E fleets, respectively.*

66. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, in the event of A–10 fleet divestment, will the Air Force mobilize ANG/AFRES A–10 units to fulfill this gap?

Ms. JAMES. Logically speaking, it would seem that a fleet divestment would include ANG and AFRES units.

67. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, how long will they be mobilized?

Ms. JAMES. Divestiture, if it were to happen, would include the ANG, AFRES and the active units.

68. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, what was the cause of the F–15E mishap that occurred during the Libya operations? (a classified response is acceptable)

Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on this, but I will look in to it, if confirmed.

69. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, which legacy close air support (CAS) platforms have a Common Missile Warning System installed?

Ms. JAMES. My understanding is that there are no Air Force legacy CAS platforms that have this specific system installed. However, legacy Air Force platforms are equipped with a number of systems to protect against missile threats to include infrared and radar warning receivers, countermeasures, jammers and decoys. The F–35 will also have advanced warning and defensive systems.

70. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, which legacy CAS platforms are considered "threshold" for the ALQ–131 Pod Upgrade Program (PUP)?

Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed on the PUP.

F–35 JOINT STRIKE FIGHTER

71. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, do you believe that our Nation needs the F–35 Joint Strike Fighter? If so, why?

Ms. JAMES. Yes, we need a fifth generation fighter aircraft to ensure air dominance.

72. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, do you believe it is important to execute the planned increase in production in fiscal year 2015 and beyond?

Ms. JAMES. I am unfamiliar with Air Force 2015 budget plans or specific F–35 production buy profiles. Intuitively an increase in production should continue to drive down unit cost, address legacy fleet recapitalization needs and provide capability sooner to help address threats. If confirmed, I look forward to reviewing the Service 2015 budget plans. From what I understand, the Air Force, like the rest of DOD, is reviewing all programs closely as it develops its future budgets against the backdrop of an uncertain fiscal environment.

AUDITABILITY

73. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, Secretary Hagel has said that DOD needs "auditable statements . . . to reassure the public, and Congress, that we are good stewards of public funds". Do you share Secretary Hagel's belief that we need auditable statements to ensure the Air Force is a good steward of our tax dollars—especially in this period of difficult budget cuts?

Ms. JAMES. Yes. Auditable financial statements provide Congress and the American public confidence that the Air Force is producing useful and reliable fiscal information, as well as spending taxpayer funds judiciously. Our current budget environment makes this effort even more urgent. Audit readiness will improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the funds entrusted to the Air Force.

74. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, do you understand that submitting an audit-ready statement of budgetary resources by September 30, 2014 is not just a goal, but it is the law?

Ms. JAMES. Yes. I fully understand that the September 30, 2014 deadline for validating the audit readiness of the statement of budgetary resources was mandated in National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2013.

75. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, in light of the cancelation late last year of the failing Expeditionary Combat Support System, do you believe the Air Force is on track to meet the 2014 and 2017 audit deadlines?

Ms. JAMES. While I don't have detailed insight into the current Air Force audit readiness plan, I know the Air Force is committed to meeting the near- and long-term audit readiness goals. I intend on ensuring this remains a priority for the Air Force, if confirmed.

76. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, what are the greatest challenges in meeting the audit readiness requirement and how can Congress help?

Ms. JAMES. I look forward to becoming more knowledgeable about Air Force audit readiness plans and goals. The "longest pole in the tent" likely will be legacy systems. Without doubt, the effort is substantial and impacts the entire enterprise. I am committed to identifying the most significant challenges, as well as practical solutions to overcoming those challenges.

77. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, do I have a commitment from you that the Air Force will meet the 2014 statement of budgetary resources deadline, as required by the 2013 NDAA?

Ms. JAMES. You have my full commitment to work this hard. I understand this is a legal requirement and will give it full attention and priority. Once confirmed, I will look more closely into where the Air Force stands today.

SEQUESTRATION AND ITS IMPACT ON READINESS

78. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, General Welsh has recently said that under sequestration, the Air Force would be unable to execute the 2012 Strategic Planning Guidance that requires the military to fight one major adversary and deter another. General Welsh also told airmen stationed in Japan that the Air Force would "not be as ready as we would like" if ordered to take action against the Syrian regime. Do you agree with General Welsh's assessments?

Ms. JAMES. I agree with General Welsh especially with respect to those forces that stopped flying due to sequestration.

79. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, what are your greatest readiness concerns if sequestration goes forward in 2014?

Ms. JAMES. If confirmed, I will focus on returning units stood down in fiscal year 2013 to operational levels of readiness.

80. Senator AYOTTE. Ms. James, General William Shelton, Commander of Air Force Space Command, recently said that sequestration threatens to "break every program" in the U.S. military space enterprise. Do you share his concern?

Ms. JAMES. I have not been briefed fully on space programs, but I agree in principle sequestration is very damaging.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MIKE LEE

RELIGION IN THE MILITARY

81. Senator LEE. Ms. James, the current Air Force Instruction (AFI) 1–1, Section 2.12.1 regarding the free exercise of religion states that airmen are free to practice the religion they choose. It goes on to state that they may "confidently practice beliefs while respecting others whose viewpoints differ from their own". What action or actions by airmen would you consider show a lack of respect for the viewpoints of others?

Ms. JAMES. Ridiculing someone because of their religion or because they are nonreligious would be contrary to the AFI you reference and counter to the wingman culture the Air Force values. It would also be disrespectful to continue pressing an unwelcome religious discussion on someone.

82. Senator LEE. Ms. James, can you please describe when the practice of faith may be restricted by the viewpoints of others?

Ms. JAMES. The practice of faith should never be restricted by the personal viewpoints of others. Accommodation of particular religious practices will be granted unless a commander determines military necessity justifies limitation of the requested accommodation. Commanders and supervisors at all levels are expected to ensure that requests for religious accommodation are dealt with fairly.

83. Senator LEE. Ms. James, what do you understand to be the difference between evangelizing, which is allowed by DOD, and proselytizing, which is not allowed?

Ms. JAMES. My understanding is that the Air Force and DOD have no policy that directly addresses religious evangelizing and proselytizing. However, there is an Air Force policy on Free Exercise of Religion and Religious Accommodation. Basically, servicemembers may share their faith with other servicemembers, but may not forcibly attempt to convert others of another faith or no faith to their own beliefs. Concerns that may arise regarding these issues are handled on a case-by-case basis by the leaders of the unit involved, in consultation with chaplains and legal advisors.

84. Senator LEE. Ms. James, how are these differences explained to commanders in the military, and do you believe it is consistently applied?

Ms. JAMES. I believe that Air Force Chaplains are directly involved in the training of squadron and wing commanders. This training includes a discussion of the commander's role in ensuring the religious freedoms of airmen. It also includes a discussion of the commanders own religious practices. If confirmed, I look forward to discussing this area more with the Chief of Air Force Chaplains and to inquire about consistency.

DEBORAH L. JAMES.

This 5th day of September, 2013.

[The nomination of Hon. Deborah L. James was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on September 24, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on December 13, 2013.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Hon. Jessica G. Wright by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the military departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. I do not see the need for any modifications. I believe that the Goldwater-Nichols Act has significantly contributed to the strong framework for today's joint warfighting capabilities. It has considerably improved inter-service and joint relationships, promoting greater effectiveness of the military departments and combatant commands.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. Currently I am unaware of any areas where modifications are needed. If I am confirmed, I will continue to assess any further need to legislative modifications.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. In October 2012, I was designated as the acting Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness. Further, in December 2012, I was named the acting Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness. In both of these roles, I supported the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense in the areas of Total Force Management as it relates to readiness; National Guard and Reserve component affairs; health affairs; training; and personnel requirements and management, including equal opportunity, morale, welfare, recreation, and quality of life matter. I have been responsible for the recruitment, career development, pay and benefits of 1.4 million Active Duty military personnel, 1.3 million Guard and Reserve personnel, 680,000 DOD civilians, and was responsible for overseeing the overall state of military readiness.

In addition, I served this country in uniform for over 35 years, a large part of that time in key leadership positions as an Active Guard Reserve officer as well as a traditional Reserve component member. My last assignment for over 7 years was as The Adjutant General of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and Commander of the Pennsylvania National Guard where I worked with a wide variety of officials at the Federal, State, and local levels. During that time, I was responsible for a vast array of programs including the personnel, equipping, training, mobilizations, deployment and demobilizations of over 20,000 guards men and women, the management and implementation of the PA National Guard responsibility for the National Special Security Event G–20, the role the PA National Guard played in providing support to Hurricane Katrina, and several aspects of the Presidential Inauguration in January 2009, to name just a few. I was also responsible for all of the Veterans programs within the Commonwealth as well as our Family support networks, Yellow Ribbon and Employer Support of the Guard and Reserve (ESGR) Programs.

MAJOR CHALLENGES

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges confronting the next Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness (P&R)?

Answer. This year marks the 40th anniversary of the All-Volunteer Force and it must remain our highest priority to maintain the quality and readiness of our Nation's Total Force. With shifting operational needs abroad and the difficult fiscal realities at home, we will need to rebalance, adapt and evolve our workforce to meet these challenges. We must do this also by providing commensurate compensation, benefits, support and medical care to our servicemembers and their families. As we face programmed reductions in military end strength, civilian workforce, and contract services, we must be vigilant in order to sustain force readiness and retain our high quality military and civilian personnel that have made our military the strongest, most capable, and respected fighting force in the history of the world.

The Department leadership is collectively focused on eliminating sexual assault from the Total Force. Even one sexual assault is one too many and out of step with the core values of the American military. Likewise, P&R must keep, at the forefront, preventing suicide and addressing mental health as we complete our mission in Afghanistan and assist our transitioning servicemembers to be successful and productive in their civilian life.

Question. If confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to support the force readiness and personnel risk reduction priorities of Secretary Hagel and Deputy Secretary Carter. I will further assess range of challenges and issues confronting the Department in these areas. I fully recognize this is a team effort and that significant progress cannot be made without leadership and close partnerships. I intend to continue to work closely with Congress; colleagues in the Office of Secretary of Defense, Joint Staff, and the Military Departments and Services; as well as with critical partners across the interagency and advocacy groups to make progress on these challenges.

DUTIES

Question. Section 136 of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary of Defense may prescribe in the areas of military readiness, total force management, military and civilian personnel requirements, military and civilian personnel training, military and civilian family matters, exchange, commissary, and non-appropriated fund activities, personnel requirements for weapons support, National Guard and Reserve components, and health affairs.

Assuming you are confirmed, what duties do you expect to be assigned to you?

Answer. If confirmed, I intend to carry out my responsibilities, functions, relationships, and authorities, in accordance with the law and consistent with DOD Directive 5124.2, "Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness (USD(P&R))." I would be the Secretary of Defense's principal staff assistant and advisor in all matters relating to the management and well-being of military and civilian personnel in the DOD Total Force and for oversight of the readiness of this force. I would develop policies and provide oversight for the direction of plans and programs governing Total Force management as it relates to manpower; force management; planning; program integration; readiness; National Guard and Reserve component affairs; health affairs; training; personnel requirements and management; and compensation. This also includes equal opportunity, morale, welfare, recreation, and quality of life matters for both civilian and military personnel and their families.

Question. In carrying out these duties, what would be your relationship with the following officials?

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to serve the Secretary as his principal advisor and advocate for Total Force Management as it relates to readiness; National Guard and Reserve component affairs; health affairs; training; and personnel requirements and management, including equal opportunity, morale, welfare, recreation, and quality of life matters.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I would expect my relationship with the Deputy Secretary to be fundamentally the same as that with the Secretary of Defense.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs (ASD(HA)).

Answer. If confirmed, ASD(HA) will be my principal advisor for all DOD health policies, programs, and force health protection activities.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs (RA).

Answer. If confirmed, ASD(RA) will be my principal advisor for all Reserve component matters in the Department of Defense (DOD).

Question. The Department of Defense General Counsel.

Answer. If confirmed, I would anticipate regular communication, coordination of actions, and exchange of views with the General Counsel and the attorneys assigned to focus on personnel policy matters. I would expect to seek and follow the advice of the General Counsel on legal and procedural matters pertaining to the policies promulgated from the off ices of the USD(P&R) office.

Question. The Department of Defense Inspector General.

Answer. The DOD Inspector General is in charge of promoting integrity, accountability, and improvement of DOD personnel, programs and operations to support the Department's mission and serve the public interest. If confirmed, I will fully assist in any investigations or issues that relate to personnel and readiness.

Question. The Service Secretaries.

Answer. If confirmed, I would hope to work closely with the Secretaries of the Military Departments on all matters relating to the management, well-being, and readiness of military and civilian personnel in the DOD Total Force structure.

Question. The Service Chiefs.

Answer. If confirmed, I would hope to work closely with the Secretaries of the Military Departments on all matters relating to the management, well-being, and readiness of military and civilian personnel in the DOD Total Force structure.

Question. The Assistant Secretaries for Manpower and Reserve Affairs of the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

Answer. If confirmed, I would intend to further strengthen the partnership with these officials in carrying out the human resource obligations of the Services for the Total Force.

Question. The Deputy Chiefs of Staff of the Army and Air Force for Personnel, the Chief of Naval Personnel, and the Deputy Commandant of the Marine Corps for Manpower and Reserve Affairs.

Answer. If confirmed, I intend to partner in effective working relationships with these officers to ensure that DOD attracts, motivates and retains the quality people it needs.

Question. The combatant commanders.

Answer. If confirmed, I would hope to work closely with the Combatant Commanders on all l matters relating to the management, well-being, and readiness of the DOD Total Force.

Question. The Joint Staff, particularly the Director for Manpower and Personnel (J–1).

Answer. If confirmed, I intend to partner a close coordinating relationship with the Joint Staff regarding manpower and personnel policy issues.

Question. The Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

Answer. The Chief, National Guard Bureau is a principal advisor to the Secretary of Defense, through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, on matters involving non-Federalized National Guard forces and on other matters as determined by the Secretary of Defense. If confirmed, I look forward to a continued strong relationship, through ASD(RA), to ensure effective integration of National Guard capabilities into a cohesive Total Force.

Question. Director, Defense Health Agency.

Answer. If confirmed, I plan to work closely with the Director of the Defense Health Agency (soon to be established), through ASD(HA), in all matter relating to the Military Health System and common medical services shared across all Services.

Question. Director, Office of Personnel Management.

If confirmed, I intend to partner a close coordinating relationship with the Director, Office of Personnel Management on matters regarding civilian personnel policies.

SYSTEMS AND SUPPORT FOR WOUNDED WARRIORS

Question. Servicemembers and civilians who are wounded or injured in combat operations deserve the highest priority from their Service and the Federal Government for support services, healing and recuperation, rehabilitation, evaluation for return to duty, successful transition from active duty if required, and continuing support after retirement or discharge. Despite the enactment of legislation and renewed emphasis over the past several years, many challenges remain.

What is your assessment of the progress made to date by DOD and the Services to improve the care, management, and transition of seriously ill and injured servicemembers and their families?

Answer. DOD and Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) continue to make progress in this area. We have reduced the overall disability evaluation time from over 500 days to 400 days and are reducing the post-separation wait for VA disability determination. We are also actively collaborating on the establishment of joint DOD/VA policy guidance, processes, and metrics for coordination of case management and care coordination programs within the two Departments related to the delivery of care, benefits and services to wounded, ill or injured servicemembers and their families. Efficiencies we have made toward expediting the paperless transfer of medical, personnel and financial data to VA and the electronic exchange of information to the Veterans Benefits Management System have both contributed to elimination of the current backlog of disability benefit claims and will benefit future Veterans by enabling VA to process claims faster and more accurately, thereby allowing those Veterans to receive earned benefits more quickly

If confirmed, I will continue to ensure an electronic and seamless transition from recovery to reintegration for our wounded, ill or injured servicemembers. Additionally, I would continue the Department's collaborative efforts with the VA on compensation and benefits, transition assistance and care coordination.

Question. What are the strengths upon which continued progress should be based?

Answer. The greatest strength is the DOD's commitment to take care of its wounded warriors and their families. That commitment will guide continued efforts by DOD and VA. Fine tuning case management and automation of certain aspects of the process will aid in reducing processing times.

Question. What are the weaknesses that need to be corrected?

Answer. The DOD and VA have undertaken a total review and revamping of our approach to case management—policy, process and IT. For example, DOD, VA and the Military Departments Care Coordinators are piloting a case management tool in the National Capital Region and Texas. The goal is to gain insights, and use these insights; to integrate non-medical and medical case information to assist recovering wounded, ill and injured servicemembers obtain a new-normal life outcome; link data transfer between recovery care and disability evaluation; and ensure quality assurance across the continuum of care. The pilot is ongoing and will conclude by summer 2014.

Question. If confirmed, are there additional strategies and resources that you would pursue to increase support for wounded servicemembers and their families, and to monitor their progress in returning to duty or to civilian life?

Answer. If confirmed, working closely with Congress and the military departments, I will continue to evaluate what additional support, including resources and/or authority, is necessary to address the needs of the wounded servicemembers, their families and caregivers. For example, in addition to the above pilot, we are taking first steps to expand our Operation Warfighter and Education and Employment Initiative opportunities beyond the government sector to include the private sector. Additionally, we have a robust adaptive sports and rehabilitation program, including such activities as gardening, arts, and team and individual sports.

Question. Studies conducted as a result of the revelations at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in 2007 pointed to the need to reform the disability evaluation system. The Integrated DES (IDES) program was established to integrate the DOD and Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) disability systems to improve and expedite processing of servicemembers through the disability evaluation system. While the processing times under the IDES were initially encouraging, servicemembers are now mired in long VA disability rating and case disposition wait times, and the VA's portion of the system appears to be overloaded.

What is your assessment of the need to further streamline and improve the IDES?

Answer. DOD has made great progress in increasing staffing and improving the performance of our portions of the IDES processes. DOD is completing its IDES core processes in 148 days against a 105-day goal. Our sustained improvement has resulted in moving a large case load downstream to VA increasing their IDES backlog. As a result, VA's inventory of cases awaiting preliminary rating has increased 46 percent since January 2013, to 9,192 cases and the VA IDES core process timeliness has increased to 272 days against a 100-day goal.

We are helping VA improve service delivery by ensuring the case files presented to them are as complete as possible. DOD is piloting an electronic case file capability to eliminate mailing and accounting of paper records by the VA and the Army has stationed 20 servicemembers at VA's Seattle rating site to help fill the gaps in DOD case files when they are identified. The intended affect is to help VA have cases "ready to rate" to allow them to adjudicate IDES cases more quickly. If confirmed, I plan to continue to look at all aspects of the system to see where opportunities exist for improvement.

Question. If confirmed, how will you address any need for change?

Answer. DOD continues to work toward a more efficient IDES using senior-level work groups and leadership councils as well as capitalizing on the information presented to us by the Recovering Warrior Task Force, Government Accountability Office, and Military Department Inspector Generals. DOD is currently undertaking several congressional studies that will give us further opportunities to enhance IDES processes. Where there are efficiencies that can be achieved by changing policy, we will do so. Additionally, we will continue our work with our VA partners to align our programs and resources together to agree on the proper paperless IT system and streamlined process changes and appropriately address them across our Departmental boundaries.

Question. If confirmed, what role would you expect to play in ensuring that the Departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs achieve the administration's objectives in DOD and VA collaboration?

Answer. In my capacity as Acting Under Secretary, I have been personally involved with DOD and VA collaborative efforts to achieve the administration's objectives and all other joint efforts with VA. If confirmed, I expect to continue to take a personal role. I will continue to provide oversight and strategic guidance, and require the staff to maintain constant contact with their VA counterparts at all echelons. I will continue to personally meet with my VA counterpart on a regular and frequent basis, formally and informally, and engage with the Secretary and Congress, and the White House staff.

REPEAL OF "DON'T ASK, DON'T TELL"

Question. What is your assessment of the effect on the force of the repeal of the Don't Ask, Don't Tell policy?

Answer. The repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" has had no impact on military readiness, effectiveness, unit cohesion, recruiting, or retention of the Armed Forces. We attribute this success to our comprehensive pre-repeal training programs, combined with the discipline of our servicemembers and continued close monitoring and enforcement of standards by our military leaders at all levels.

Question. What military benefits are currently being provided to same-sex spouses and to same-sex partners?

Answer. It is the Department's policy to treat all married military personnel equally. Therefore, the same benefits are available to all military spouses, regardless of whether they are in same-sex or opposite-sex marriages. No benefits are provided to domestic partners, regardless of whether they are in same-sex or opposite-sex domestic partnerships.

Question. Are there any additional military benefits that should be considered for same-sex spouses and partners?

Answer. No, it is the Department's policy to treat all married military personnel equally. The same benefits are available to all military spouses, regardless of whether they are in same-sex or opposite-sex marriages.

Question. What is your assessment of the current and projected future impact to resourcing that will be required to provide military benefits to same-sex spouses and partners?

Answer. The costs associated with same-sex benefits are not significant from a cost perspective and will be absorbed within the existing Department budget.

Question. If confirmed, what actions, if any, would you pursue in this regard?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to ensure that all military personnel and their spouses are treated equally with access to the same benefits.

Question. According to press accounts, two States—Texas and Mississippi—are refusing to allow same-sex spouses to apply for Federal benefits in State-supported facilities, citing conflicts with State law.

If confirmed, what actions would you take to ensure that members of the National Guard of the United States will receive the Federal benefits to which they are entitled?

Answer. Identification cards are currently available in all Federal facilities for all military spouses, regardless of whether they are in same-sex or opposite-sex marriages. The Department is currently examining the matter of those National Guard sites that are not issuing identification cards to same-sex spouses with our legal counsel and evaluating options to address the issue. In the meantime, we are asking same sex spouses desiring cards to go to the nearest Federal facility.

Question. On September 4, 2013 you signed a policy memorandum that authorized "administrative absence to obtain a legal marriage" when a member is part of a couple that desires to get married and is assigned to a duty station located more than 100 miles from a U.S. State, the District of Columbia, or other jurisdiction that allows the couple to get married. This memorandum revoked an August 13, 2013 change to DOD Instruction 1327.06 that authorized uncharged leave for same-sex couples to travel from the area of a permanent duty station for the purpose of obtaining a legal marriage. The authority established in your September 4th memo, while neutral on its face, appears to only benefit same sex couples who want to be married and not heterosexual couples.

What is your understanding concerning whether there are any circumstances in which heterosexual members who want to obtain a legal marriage would be eligible for uncharged leave under the policy set forth in your September 4, 2013 memorandum?

Answer. We have identified several situations in which heterosexual members who want to obtain a legal marriage would be eligible for administrative absence under the current policy. The nature of military service often involves short notice deployments and temporary duty to far off or foreign locations. That Service does not always allow a member to meet the requirements necessary to obtain a marriage license in the State in which the member is assigned. Some States have age restrictions which require that one or both members of a couple be of a certain age or to obtain a parent's or guardian's permission before marrying. This permission may not be obtainable within the limited timeframe that military service sometimes allows. Finally, several States impose a waiting period to obtain a marriage license which may not be achievable for a deploying member of the Armed Forces. All of these are examples in which a commander may grant an administrative absence to facilitate a legal marriage.

Question. In your view is the use of regular leave accrued by all members of the Armed Forces at the rate of 2½ calendar days for each month of Active service, as authorized by title 10, U.S.C., section 701(a), inadequate for the purpose of allowing leave for all servicemembers who want to be married to be married?

Answer. The current accrual rate of annual leave is sufficient for most servicemembers who choose to obtain a legal marriage. This policy however, was crafted to allow flexibility for those members who cannot obtain a legal marriage within 100 miles of their assignment. Because laws differ around the globe, providing members time to ensure their relationships are recognized under law is a reasonable accommodation. In addition, the Department has committed to conduct annual reviews to determine if this policy remains necessary.

Question. What is your understanding of the authority of the Secretary of Defense to create a new category of administrative absence, for 7 to 10 days in a paid status, for members of the armed services in circumstances where the member could otherwise use earned leave?

Answer. The authority for approved absences from duty already exists under current OSD policy (DODI 1327.06), and there is longstanding precedent that commanders have discretionary authority to grant administrative absence to servicemembers. Examples of similar administrative absences include house hunting, attendance at professional meetings, and time off to officiate at a retirement ceremony.

Question. How does the policy in your September 4 memorandum promote the express goal of treating all military personnel equally and making the same benefits available to all qualified members?

Answer. In an effort to treat everyone equally, and after careful consideration and consultation with the Chiefs and Secretaries of the Services, as well as the Chairman of the Joints Chiefs of Staff, our September 4th policy was expressly crafted so that it applied equally to both same sex and opposite sex couples.

RELIGIOUS GUIDELINES

Question. In your view, do DOD policies concerning religious accommodation in the military appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs, including individual expressions of belief, without impinging on those who have different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. Yes, in my view, current DOD policies appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion for all servicemembers in the pluralistic environment that is the U.S. military. DOD does not endorse any one religion or religious organization, and provides free access of religion for all members of the Military Services. The Department respects (and supports by its policy) the rights of others to their own religious beliefs, including the right to hold no beliefs.

Question. Under current law and policy, are individual expressions of belief accommodated so long as they do not impact good order and discipline?

Answer. Current law and policy ensure servicemembers' rights to observe the tenets of their respective religions, as well as to hold no specific religious conviction or affiliation. The Chaplaincies of the Military Departments advise and assist commanders in the discharge of their responsibilities to provide for the free exercise of religion in the context of military service as guaranteed by the Constitution, assist commanders in managing Religious Affairs and serve as the principal advisors to commanders to ensure these expressions of belief do not adversely impact mission accomplishment, including good order and discipline.

Question. In your view, do existing policies and practices regarding public prayers offered by military chaplains in a variety of formal and informal settings strike the proper balance between a chaplain's ability to pray in accordance with his or her religious beliefs and the rights of other servicemembers with different beliefs, including no religious beliefs?

Answer. Existing DOD policies provide military chaplains with sufficient guidance that allows them to balance to the extent their religious beliefs allow, in both formal and informal settings, their own faith practices with the rights of others who may hold different or no religious beliefs. The Chaplaincies of the Military Departments train and equip chaplains with the knowledge and skill to help them make this proper balance.

Question. Section 533 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2013 (P.L. 112–239) protects rights of conscience of members of the Armed Forces and chaplains of such members, and prohibits, so far as possible, use of such beliefs as the basis of any adverse personnel action, discrimination, or denial of promotion, schooling, training, or assignment. Members of some religious denominations have sincerely held beliefs in opposition to same-sex marriage.

In your view, may a member of the armed forces who has a sincerely held belief in opposition to same-sex marriage be subject to adverse personnel action or similar other adverse action, if he or she shares those personal views on the subject in an official capacity?

Answer. The issue—a servicemember expressing personal views when speaking in his/her official capacity, is significant. Servicemembers speaking in their official capacities are expected to express official views, especially when dealing with subordinates. Expressing personal views while speaking in an official capacity can create confusion, and may give the impression of encouraging disagreement with DOD policy or the law. Servicemembers are entitled to have personal views and to express them in personal conversations; however, servicemembers are not entitled to use their official capacity as a forum to express their personal views. Servicemembers who express personal views when speaking in an official capacity may be held accountable for what they say.

Question. Can he or she be subject to adverse personnel action if they express personal views on same sex marriage in their personal capacity?

Answer. Expressions of personal views by servicemembers in their private capacities generally are permissible because they are integral to the free speech and the free exercise of religion. Traditionally, private conversations in the barracks have included expressions of views contrary to DOD policy. However, personal expressions which disrupt the mission or have an adverse impact on good order and discipline may cause the member to be counseled by his/her chain of command, not for the views but for the disruption to the mission.

Question. The Independent Review Related to Fort Hood observed that "DOD policy regarding religious accommodation lacks the clarity necessary to help commanders distinguish appropriate religious practices from those that might indicate a potential for violence or self-radicalization." Recommendation 2.7 of the Final Recommendations urged the Department to update policy to clarify guidelines for religious accommodation and Recommendation 2.8 urged the Department to task the Defense Science Board to "undertake a multi-disciplinary study to identify behavioral indicators of violence and self-radicalization . . . ".

What action has the Department taken with respect to these recommendations?

Answer. Ensuring appropriate accommodations for the free exercise of religions and protecting servicemembers from violence and harm are both of vital importance. Pursuant to Recommendation 2.7, the Department updated its policy on religious accommodation to ensure religious freedoms and practices are accommodated to the fullest extent possible considering mission readiness, discipline and unit cohesion. This policy is in the final stage of revision to incorporate language from the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, section 533, which protects the rights of conscience of members of the Armed Forces and chaplains. Regarding Recommendation 2.8, the Department did task the Defense Science Board (DSB) to undertake a study.

PREVENTION OF AND RESPONSE TO SEXUAL ASSAULTS

Question. What additional steps would you take, if confirmed, to address the problem of sexual assaults in the military?

Answer. We recognize there is no single solution to solving the problem of sexual assault and have adopted a multi-disciplinary approach that includes a variety of initiatives in prevention, investigation, accountability, victim assistance and assessments. If confirmed, I will continue to work to ensure our program prevents crimes from occurring in the first place. But, when crimes do occur, we must have comprehensive, effective, accessible and responsive investigative and victim assistance services available. I will work to ensure that our program continues to educate all servicemembers, frontline commanders and leaders and hold them accountable in establishing a culture of dignity and respect; fully implements our DOD Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Strategic Plan and the 16 recently-announced Secretary of Defense directives; and sustains our current level of attention, focus, and emphasis throughout the entire Department.

Question. In 2012, for the fourth year in a row, there were more than 3,000 reported cases of sexual assault in the military, including 2,558 unrestricted reports, and an additional 816 restricted reports. Moreover, a recent survey conducted by the DOD indicates that the actual number of sexual offenses could be considerably higher, as 6.1 percent of Active Duty women and 1.2 percent of Active Duty men surveyed reported having experienced an incident of unwanted sexual contact in the previous 12 months. This survey has been criticized by some because its conclusions are extrapolated from an unscientific sample set and the questions asked in the survey were too imprecise.

What is your assessment of the scientific accuracy of the DOD survey?

Answer. The Defense Manpower Data Center's (DMDC) survey division has conducted surveys of the military and DOD community using stratified random sampling for over 20 years, subscribing to methodological best practices promoted by the American Association for Public Opinion Research. The scientific method of stratified random sampling is the principal method used by government statistical agencies and private survey firms that conduct surveys, such as the Army Research Institute (ARI), Census Bureau, the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Gallup, RAND, WESTAT, RTI, Pew, and Roper.

For this survey, DMDC worked with DOD's legal experts here at Headquarters and in the field to ensure behaviors prohibited in the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) were appropriately captured in the unwanted sexual contact (USC) survey question. The behaviorally-based question includes a range of physical behaviors prohibited by the UCMJ (from unwanted sexual touching of the breasts or buttocks through completed sexual intercourse), but does not include unwanted touching of non-sexual areas of the body (e.g., the shoulder, back, legs, or arms) or offensive verbal remarks or gestures (these behaviors are captured separately).

Question. What is your assessment of the scientific accuracy of the interpretation of the results of that survey in the 2012 report?

Answer. The accuracy of survey results are dependent on whether the sample used is randomly drawn and conforms to scientific "best practices" for sampling and weighting procedures. Criticism of the 2012 Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members (WGRA) as "unscientific" and unreliable is uniformly false and based on a basic lack of understanding of the scientific sampling and weighting methods employed by DMDC. DMDC uses state-of-the-art scientific statistical techniques to draw conclusions from random, representative samples of the active duty population and can accurately generalize to the full active duty population using a complex, but precise, scientific weighting process that accounts for sampling error, nonresponse, and the necessary oversampling of smaller populations within the sample. In conducting this research, DMDC has a decided advantage over many public and private opinion pollsters since DMDC is the DOD repository for all military personnel data and is able to use demographic data to inform the sampling and weighting process. It also allows respondents the ability to answer sensitive questions without disclosing identifying demographic information—a strategy strongly encouraged by experts in the field, but rarely available to other polling organizations.

Question. If confirmed, what actions will you take to obtain better data on sexual assaults in the military?

Answer. DMDC is already working closely with the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office, the Services, and senior DOD leaders to look for ways to continue to improve the 2014 WGRA survey and refine the metrics and measures that scientifically and effectively evaluate sexual assault within DOD. DOD is also working with other agencies, such as CDC, to help increase the comparability of DOD data to other sexual assault victimization data collected about civilians across the United States.

I have also directed that DMDC and the Services coordinate their survey efforts to minimize burden on servicemembers and maximize the sharing of information from each survey effort. Coordination of survey efforts to minimize respondent burden is critical as we must recognize the adverse impact from over-surveying the same population, which has caused a decline in response rates across DOD surveys.

DMDC is also currently conducting a scientific review of non-response to these DOD surveys. This analysis will identify whether those who did not respond to the survey would have provided significantly different answers than those who did respond. Findings from this analysis may contribute to improving the sampling methodology for future WGRA surveys. If confirmed, I will continue to ensure we use the most scientific and effective survey methods to assess sexual assault in DOD.

Question. What is your assessment of the current DOD sexual assault prevention and response program?

Answer. Our Sexual Assault Prevention and Response program is dynamic and we are consistently assessing it and striving to benefit from our lessons learned, best and promising practices, and inputs from stakeholders across our Nation. When methods are identified that can advance our efforts to build trust and improve our response, we act to implement these upgrades when they are within the Department's authorities; when a best practice is identified, we work to make it a common practice throughout the Department. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with Members of Congress to assess current policy and identify needed changes.

Question. What is your view of the provision for restricted and unrestricted reporting of sexual assaults?

Answer. When a victim makes the difficult decision to come forward and report, we need to provide multiple reporting options. I support offering victims two reporting options, based on previous studies and commissions that found that some victims choose to forgo reporting and support services for fear of automatically initiating a criminal investigation. To address this barrier, the Department instituted two reporting options: Restricted and Unrestricted Reporting. Initiated in 2005, the Restricted Reporting option allows victims to confidentially access medical care and advocacy services without initiating an official investigation or command notification. This differs from the Unrestricted Reporting option, in which when a victim makes an Unrestricted Report, it is referred for investigation, and command is notified. As with Restricted Reporting, victims may receive healthcare, counseling, and advocacy services. Since 2005, over 5,000 servicemembers have used the Unrestricted Reporting option.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of DOD oversight of military service implementation of the DOD and Service policies for the prevention of and response to sexual assaults?

Answer. In my view, we are providing extensive oversight and accountability of this important mission, and are continuing to employ multiple accountability tools to assess the issue of sexual assault prevention and response (SAPR) in DOD. The Department publishes two accountability reports on sexual assault each year: the DOD Annual Report on Sexual Assault in the Military and the Annual Report on Sexual Harassment and Violence at the Military Service Academies (MSA). These comprehensive reports serve as the Department's primary means for evaluating and communicating oversight of its SAPR program, and provide transparency and accountability for every report of sexual assault.

In addition, DOD Inspector General (DOD IG) reviews are a valuable tool used to ensure accountability, integrity, and efficiency. To date, the DOD IG has conducted three separate reviews to assess different aspects of how the overall system responds to and handles sexual assault cases. Additionally, in 2011, the DOD IG formed a new Violent Crime Division focused on evaluating and improving the quality of the Department's violent crime investigations, including sexual assault. This unit evaluates the sexual assault investigation training and compliance with DOD policy in the Military Criminal Investigative Organizations.

The Secretary of Defense hosts weekly meetings of the senior leaders in this Department to hold the entire prevention and response system accountable. Also, the Director of the SAPR Office chairs an Executive Integrated Product Team consisting of General and Flag Officers and members of the Senior Executive Service from OSD, the Military Departments, and the Services every other month providing detailed review and oversight of the SAPR program. Finally, OSD provides subject matter expertise and analysis to a quarterly SAPR Joint Executive Council convened by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and designed to review SAPR program performance and effectiveness across each of the Military Services.

Question. What is your view about the role of the chain of command in changing the military culture in which these sexual assaults have occurred?

Answer. As we have seen in other recent military culture changes, culture change starts at the top with commanders and leaders leading by example and enforcing standards of conduct. The role of the chain of command in changing the military culture is paramount. Central to our approach is requiring leaders at all levels to foster a command climate where sexist behaviors, sexual harassment, and sexual assault are not condoned or ignored; where dignity and respect are core values we live by and define how we treat one another; where victims' reports are treated with the utmost seriousness, their privacy is protected, and they are treated with sensitivity; where bystanders are motivated to intervene to prevent unsafe behaviors; and where offenders know they will be held appropriately accountable by a strong and effective system of justice. Commanders and leaders at every level are the key to eliminate and enforce standards and in achieving these goals as we have seen in other culture change in the military as the repeal of "Don't Ask Don't Tell."

Question. What is your view about the role of the chain of command in providing necessary support to the victims of sexual assault?

Answer. Commanders and frontline leaders are responsible for mission accomplishment and for caring for the women and men assigned to their commands. This is a core axiom of leadership in the profession of arms. Commanders and leaders at all levels are responsible and must be held accountable for supporting victims' full range of timely and responsive care, as well as for establishing a command climate where victims are treated with the sensitivity and privacy they deserve. If confirmed, I will continue to emphasize these central elements of leadership.

Question. In your view, what would be the impact of requiring a judge advocate outside the chain of command to determine whether allegations of sexual assault should be prosecuted?

Answer. In my view, taking the disposition decision in the administration of military justice from the commander would undermine readiness and leave the chain of command without the necessary tools to develop a cohesive fighting force by enforcing good order and discipline. I agree with Secretary Hagel that this authority must remain in the command structure and that we must continue to make it more accountable. We need commanders more involved not less involved to solve the issue of sexual assault. That said, we look forward to the report of the Response Systems Panel's review of this issue.

Question. What is your view of the protections afforded to victims who are required to testify at Article 32, Uniform Code of Military Justice, investigations that are required before charges can be referred to a General Court-Martial?

Answer. In my view, we must continue to work on building victim confidence, and that includes process improvements to prevent potential revictimization during the Article 32 process. Recently, the Secretary directed a number of changes that I support, including ensuring that Judge Advocates serve as investigating officers for all Article 32 hearings on sexual assault charges and providing legal representation to victims of sexual assault in an attorney-client relationship, similar to the Air Force pilot program begun in January of this year.

SERVICE ACADEMIES

Question. What do you consider to be the policy and procedural elements that must be in place at each of the Service Academies in order to prevent and respond appropriately to sexual assaults and sexual harassment and to ensure essential oversight?

Answer. Sexual assault has no place at the Military Service Academies and is antithetical to their core values and missions. Prevention and response to sexual assault must be completely integrated into the full spectrum of Service Academy life and learning. The Department will continue to assess the Academies efforts to develop and refine prevention and response programs in order to establish a culture free of sexual harassment and assault. If confirmed, I will review those programs and partner with the Academies to continue to better educate and train the cadets and midshipmen, and to ensure the Department provides appropriate response and support for the victim if a crime does occur.

Question. What is your assessment of measures taken at the Service Academies to ensure religious tolerance and respect, and to prevent sexual assaults and sexual harassment?

Answer. The Academies continue to put considerable effort into the development and implementation of policies and procedures designed to address religious tolerance. The Academies do not endorse any one religion or religious organization, and provide free access of religion for all members of the Military Services. In the past few years, the Academies' leadership has emphasized the need for greater respect for the rights of others to their own religious beliefs, including the right to hold no beliefs.

While the Service Academies have made great efforts, more needs to be done to reduce the level of sexual harassment and sexual violence. It will require continued persistence and innovative measures at each institution. If confirmed, I will remain committed to ensuring that prevention efforts are strong, victims receive care, offenders are held appropriately accountable and proper support is offered to cadets and midshipmen throughout their academic career.

ASSIGNMENT POLICIES FOR WOMEN IN THE MILITARY

Question. The Department in January rescinded the policy restricting the assignment of women to certain units which have the primary mission of engaging in direct ground combat operations, and has given the military services until January 1, 2016, to open all positions currently closed to women, or to request an exception to policy to keep a position closed beyond that date, an exception that must be approved by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Secretary of Defense. The services are working now to develop gender-free physical and mental standards for all military occupations, presumably with the goal of allowing individuals, regardless of gender, to serve in those positions if they can meet those standards.

If confirmed, what role will you play in the development of these standards?

Answer. The Services and U.S. Special Forces Command (SOCOM) are working with various scientific and research agencies (Ex: U.S. Army Research Institute for Environmental Medicine, Center for Naval Analyses, Air Education and Training Command, and RAND) to review and validate occupational standards to ensure they are occupationally and operationally relevant and are applied gender-neutrally by September 2015.

Along with the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Service Chiefs, I will monitor the progress the Services and SOCOM are making toward integration of females into previously closed occupations and positions. The Department will provide notification to Congress before opening any additional positions.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that the standards are realistic and preserve, or enhance, military readiness and mission capability?

Answer. DOD is aware of Public Law 103–160, section 543, which prohibits the Department from changing an occupational performance standard for the purpose of increasing or decreasing the number of women in that occupational career field. We are working with RAND to ensure physical standards are gender neutral and accurately correlate with the requirements of the position or occupation Question. Do you believe that decisions to open positions should be based on bona fide military requirements? If so, what steps would you take to ensure that such decisions are made on this basis?

Answer. It is in the best interest of the Department to allow both men and women who meet the standards for military positions and units to compete for them. Rescission of the 1994 policy provides a way forward to fully integrate women without compromising our readiness, morale, or warfighting capacity. By removing gender as a disqualifier for certain positions, all servicemembers will have the opportunity for assignment to positions for which they qualify.

Question. Some family members have expressed concerns about assigning women to what are currently male-only combat units.

To what extent do you believe that this will be a problem in the implementation of this policy?

Answer. I understand, and appreciate, family members may have these concerns for their loved ones. I expect our commanders to select the best qualified personnel, male or female, and create a command climate that focuses on mission accomplishment and treat each person with dignity. We have had a number of women in newly opened units since mid-2012, and have already experienced successful integration of women into formerly male-only units. We will leverage this experience moving forward.

Question. If it is a problem, what steps would you take to address it?

Answer. We require the Services to provide us feedback on their elimination of gender-restrictive policies, including the status of women in these newly opened positions. If problems are encountered, I will, if confirmed, examine the issue and address it considering all dimensions and all recommendations consistent with sustaining readiness.

RISING COSTS OF MEDICAL CARE

Question. In testimony presented to Congress in February, 2009, the Assistant Director of the Congressional Budget Office asserted that "medical funding accounts for more than one-third of the growth projected for operations and support funding between 2009 and 2026." In April 2009, Secretary Gates told an audience at Maxwell Air Force Base that "health care is eating the Department alive." In recent years, the Department has attempted to address this growth through fee increases for military retirees, while also attempting to identify and implement other means to ensure the viability of the military health system in the future.

What is your assessment of the long-term impact of rising medical costs on future DOD plans?

Answer. I realize the health care benefit contributes to the retention of our men and women in service. But the reality is that health care costs are a serious problem for the Department, consuming nearly 10 percent of the budget. Simply stated, rising health care costs pose a real threat to our readiness and modernization efforts. If confirmed, I will continue to work with beneficiaries, advocacy groups, Congress and our medical establishment to find workable solutions to sustain the benefit in a realistic and affordable way without breaking faith with our troops and their families.

Question. If confirmed, what actions will you initiate or recommend to the Secretary of Defense to mitigate the effect of such costs on the DOD top-line?

Answer. Managing health care costs is a shared responsibility among the government, providers and the beneficiary. In addition to seeking reasonable beneficiary cost share reforms, if confirmed I will work with key stakeholders to pursue promising cost saving initiatives such as emphasizing wellness and prevention and working with our medical leadership to capitalize on internal efficiency opportunities.

Question. What reforms in infrastructure, benefits, or benefit management, if any, do you think should be examined in order to control the costs of military health care?

Answer. I firmly believe that we must adopt a holistic approach to addressing the rising costs of health care. Responsible benefit reform should be one part of the solution, but not the only solution. If confirmed, I will continue to look for ways to optimize our medical infrastructure to include leveraging the work of the recent Modernization Study. I see great opportunities to reduce overhead through the implementation of the Defense Health Agency and shared services. Finally, there are numerous cost saving opportunities in such areas as logistics, provider payment reform, and anti-fraud efforts, just to name a few.

ANNUAL INCREASE IN RATES OF BASIC PAY BELOW THE EMPLOYMENT COST INDEX

Question. The Department has requested an across-the-board pay raise for 2014 for military personnel of 1 percent, versus a 1.8 percent rise in the Employment Cost Index (ECI) benchmark, and has indicated that in order to restrain the growth of personnel costs, similar below-ECI pay raises may be necessary over the next several years.

What is your assessment of the impact a 1 percent pay raise would have on recruiting and retention for 2014? What would be the impact of a 1 percent pay raise in 2015 through 2017?

Answer. I recognize the sacrifices made by the men and women in our Armed Forces. A 1.0 percent military basic pay increase ensures their pay continues to compare favorably with that of American workers. The Department does not believe a 1 percent military basic pay raise will materially affect recruiting and retention in 2014. At this time, the Department does not have sufficient data to determine the long-range impacts of a 1 percent pay raise beyond 2014 on retention and recruiting.

Question. Some have suggested that the difference between the 1 percent pay raise requested by the administration, and the 1.8 percent increase based on the ECI could be paid for by realizing efficiencies within DOD.

What is your assessment of the ability of the Department to fund the full 1.8 percent increase in basic pay through efficiencies?

Answer. The Department is continually searching for efficiencies, and the pay raise proposal was a tough decision reached by our senior leaders after carefully weighing other options and efficiencies for savings. The Department is working diligently to ensure our servicemembers receive fair compensation that recognizes the sacrifices they make for our country, while still adhering to our budgetary constraints.

Answer. Currently, military compensation compares favorably with compensation in the private sector. The Department believes a 1 percent military basic pay increase is preferable to having to reduce military end strength by thousands of additional troops on top of the drawdown already planned, or further cut funds for training and equipping our forces to achieve these savings.

Question. The Department has traditionally compared Regular Military Compensation against comparable civilian salaries to devise a percentile as a way to assess the relative attractiveness of military pay versus civilian pay.

What is the current comparable percentile of military pay versus civilian pay for officers and enlisted personnel?

Answer. The Department's most recent study, performed by the 11th Quadrennial Review of Military Compensation, compared regular military compensation for officers and enlisted members with pay for civilians with comparable education and experience levels. Its report found that, on average, regular military compensation for officers was at the 83rd percentile and for enlisted members the 90th percentile.

Question. How do these percentiles compare to the base level at which the Department feels military compensation must be to effectively recruit and retain the highest quality personnel possible for military service?

Answer. The Report of the 9th Quadrennial Review of Military Compensation evaluated military compensation levels and found that compensation at approximately the 70th percentile of comparably educated and experienced civilians was necessary to enable the military to recruit and retain the appropriate quantity and quality of personnel. Measured against that benchmark, current military compensation compares favorably with private-sector compensation.

MENTAL HEALTH CARE

Question. Senior military leaders have long recognized the need to reduce the stigma for military personnel and their families and veterans in seeking mental health care, yet we continue to hear from servicemembers that the stigma persists.

If confirmed, what actions will you take to reduce the stigma associated with seeking mental health care by military personnel and their families?

Answer. If confirmed, I would support ongoing Department efforts to combat stigma and increase help-seeking behavior among servicemembers, their families, and affected civilians. Both the Department and the Services are currently heavily engaged in this effort. I am also prepared to provide the Service Chiefs with whatever resources are necessary to expand the breadth of the outreach efforts. I fully support the Department's efforts to improve health and mental healthcare services, and reduce the stigma of mental healthcare for our men and women in uniform, their families, and affected civilians.

Question. In your view, are DOD's current mental health resources adequate to serve all active duty and eligible Reserve component members and their families, as well as retirees and their dependents?

Answer. Yes, after making significant investments in infrastructure and capacity over the last decade, DOD's current mental health resources are adequate to serve our active duty, family and veteran populations. Within DOD, strategies for hiring and retention of mental health providers resulted in a 40 percent increase in mental health providers over the last 3 years. This includes a 40 percent increase in the number of psychologists, a 26 percent increase in the number of psychiatrists, a 42 percent increase in the number of social workers, and a 27 percent increase in the number of mental health nurses. This represents a fill rate of 99 percent of funded positions, which compares favorably to industry averages.

SUICIDE PREVENTION

Question. The numbers of suicides in each of the services continue to be of great concern to the committee, though military suicide rates appear to remain lower than suicide rates for the same age groups in the civilian sector.

If confirmed, what role would you play in shaping DOD policies to help prevent suicides both in garrison and in theater and to increase the resiliency of all servicemembers and their families?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to collaborate with the Services, VA, and other public and private organization and experts to further foster best practices in the prevention of suicide and build resilience within our force. During my tenure as Acting Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, the first DOD-wide comprehensive suicide prevention policy was issued. We recently established a Peer Crisis Hotline in Afghanistan to support our servicemembers in theater and expanded our Military Crisis line to Europe and Korea. I have ensured that the Vets4Warriors peer support program continued and was extended to all servicemembers and their families this year. I also implemented a program evaluation methodology aligning the DOD's suicide prevention strategy with the National Strategy for Suicide Prevention to ensure its effectiveness and efficiency. I will continue to work with the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) regarding our joint Suicide Data Repository, which now hosts mortality data on all who have served dating back to 1979.

Increasing the resiliency of all DOD Personnel—military and civilian—and their families remains one of the key factors in the prevention of suicide and one of the central tasks assigned to the newly established Defense Suicide Prevention Office under my purview.

Question. Recent media articles have raised concerns about the possible role of Servicemembers Group Life Insurance (SGLI) proceeds to survivors as a contributing factor in suicide attempts by servicemembers.

Has the Department examined whether SGLI proceeds, or other monetary benefits associated with the death of servicemember, could impact a servicemember's decision to commit suicide?

Answer. The Department has examined the issue and found that the research on the association between insurance coverage and suicide is not conclusive. The Department of Veterans Affairs, which oversees the SGLI program, adheres to a determination standard that suicide victims were not of sound mind and adjudicates insurance claims based on that policy. Hence, there should not be any restrictions on coverage to the survivors.

READINESS RESPONSIBILITIES

Question. Section 136 of title 10, U.S.C., gives the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness (USD(P&R)) certain responsibilities for military readiness. Some important issues that affect military readiness, however, such as logistics and materiel readiness, have been placed under the jurisdiction of the Under Secretary for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics.

What is your assessment of the impacts and challenges to DOD readiness as a result of sequestration?

Answer. Sequestration has significantly limited the Services' ability to generate ready forces to meet a broad range of mission requirements. We are meeting current operational requirements with well trained and equipped units, but this is getting more difficult. The brunt of the sequester effects is in our ability to generate forces to meet contingency surge requirements and this is a serious concern. Some of these effects will take considerable time and resources to reverse.

Question. What is your assessment of how the recent DOD furloughs have impacted readiness?

Answer. A ready unit is the product of myriad personnel, training, and equipment pipelines. Our DOD civilian labor force keeps these pipelines moving. They are the technicians at our depots, the support for our training ranges, and the instructors at our schools—we cannot generate ready forces without them. We know that furloughs just completed increased maintenance backlogs at our depots and reduced the quantity and quality of our training. These effects will take time to resolve. We are concerned that as the budget uncertainty persists, the most skilled of this workforce will simply leave Federal service, thereby creating permanent degradations in critical skill areas.

Question. What is your assessment of the current readiness of our Armed Forces to execute the National Military Strategy?

Answer. Today our forces are postured globally, conducting counterterrorism, stability, and deterrence operations, maintaining a stabilizing presence, conducting bilateral and multilateral training to enhance our security relationships, and providing the crisis response capabilities required to protect U.S. interests. The investments made in our Armed Forces have helped maintain our military's standing as the most formidable force in the world.

We remain able to meet the most critical ongoing operational and presence requirements that the Nation asks of us, however this is getting more difficult as the effects of sequester materialize. What is at risk is our ability to generate the surge required for a high-end emergent crisis and this is a serious concern.

Question. In your view, what are the most significant challenges to the current readiness of our Armed Forces?

Answer. The defense strategy requires that our force meet a growing number of global security concerns as it recovers from 12 years of direct combat. We are concerned that current budget constraints will thwart the Services' efforts to regain full-spectrum readiness in order to successfully meet the tenets of the defense strategy. The Services made deliberate plans to shift from counterinsurgency (COIN) focused operations to address more globalized, full spectrum warfighter requirements. Those plans are at risk if sequestration remains in effect. Specifically, training opportunities and equipment condition are our primary concerns in preserving readiness across the force.

Question. What is your understanding of the responsibilities of the USD(P&R) and relationship to the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Logistics and Materiel Readiness in ensuring military readiness, including materiel readiness?

Answer. The responsibilities of the USD(P&R) are to develop policies, plans, and programs for the Total Force to ensure efficient and effective support of wartime and peacetime operations, contingency planning, and preparedness. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Logistics and Materiel Readiness oversees material readiness. Force readiness and materiel readiness have a symbiotic relationship, and as such, I have actively sought to sustain and strengthen this relationship in my current capacity. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with my Department counterpart in this area.

Question. What are the most critical objectives to improve readiness reporting and monitoring of the military forces, and if confirmed, how would you work with the Military Departments as well as other Office of the Secretary of Defense offices to achieve them?

Answer. The most critical element of readiness management is the ability to monitor not just the status of unit readiness, but the health of the pipelines that support it. These downstream metrics not only provide a more complete picture of readiness, but they are also the key to forecasting problems. In my current capacity, I have overseen dramatic improvements in the Department's ability to monitor readiness along these lines.

If confirmed, I will continue partnering with the Services, the Joint Staff, the combatant commanders, and other OSD partners to systematically monitor these pipelines, articulate the likely operational consequences, and provide mitigation options.

Question. Do you believe the current readiness reporting system accurately shows if our forces are not only "ready" but "ready for what"?

Answer. Yes. The Defense Readiness Reporting System directly addresses the "ready for what" question by focusing on mission capability. It assesses the readiness of all organizations throughout the Department to perform their assigned missions.

Question. What is your understanding of the responsibilities of the USD(P&R) with respect to the Global Response Force?

Answer. The USD(P&R) provides policy guidance for monitoring the readiness levels of units assigned to the Global Response Force. USD(P&R) also collaborates with the Joint Staff to identify readiness deficiencies within the Global Response Force and recommends mitigation options for the Secretary's consideration. Finally, as the resource sponsor for the Department-wide joint training, exercise and engagement program, the USD(P&R) also facilitates the leveraging of Service or Combatant Command training events to exercise the Global Response Force.

END STRENGTH REDUCTIONS

Question. The Department last year laid out a defense strategy that proposes eventual end strengths of 490,000 for the Army and 182,000 for the Marine Corps over the next 5 years.

What is your understanding of the Army's and Marine Corps' ability to meet these goals without forcing out many soldiers and marines who have served in combat over the past 10 years with the implicit promise that they could compete for career service and retirement?

Answer. Based on the current rate of drawdown and projected losses, I am confident the Army and Marines Corps will meet their fiscal year 2018 prescribed end strengths. Unfortunately, due to many years of war, the size of our personnel reductions, and deep budget cuts, it may be difficult for the Services to properly shape their force without separating some of our combat veterans. Voluntary and involuntary separations may be necessary to ensure the military is postured correctly for mission readiness and to meet national security objectives during this time of budgetary constraints. As we become a leaner Force, it is imperative the Services have the best qualified individuals available to ensure mission success.

Question. What programs are in place to ensure that separating and retiring servicemembers are as prepared as they can be as they enter a struggling economy?

Answer. The 2011 Vow to Hire Heroes Act requires a pre-separation counseling assessment and counseling, Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) benefits briefing and Department of Labor employment workshop (with some exceptions). This has been in place since November 2012. An enhanced Transition Assistance Program (TAP), which will be completed in March 2014, provides a 2-day higher education track (complete college application); a 2-day technical track (complete technical training application); and a 2-day entrepreneurship and business plan education track.

Question. How fast can the Army and Marine Corps responsibly and fairly reduce end strength while maintaining the integrity and readiness of combat units?

Answer. The Department expects a significant drawdown in Army and Marine Corps forces over the next several years. I understand that sequestration cuts will likely force the consideration of even steeper reductions than we've previously planned. Regardless of the actual target, my concern remains the same—in making the forces leaner, the Department should take care to learn the lessons of previous drawdowns. Our military must remain able to respond to any large-scale contingency operation. This will require careful consideration by Services about their organizational structures and their ability to reconstitute and mobilize forces. These reductions must be done with an eye toward those who have already served in combat and for those with families who have experienced extended separations, by maximizing voluntary programs and using the full range of authorities provided by Congress.

Question. If sequestration continues through 2018, what will be the impact on the Active Duty and Reserve end strengths of all the Services, and how would the mix between the Active and Reserve Forces be affected?

Answer. Future rounds of sequestration will be devastating and will limit our ability to generate healthy, prepared forces especially in the near term. It is also forcing a difficult decision between a larger unready force, or a smaller ready force. Neither option is without concern. It is too soon to tell exactly how these decisions will manifest across capabilities or components.

I do know that a healthy Reserve Force is an absolutely critical element of both homeland and overseas operations. We cannot revert back to past practices of gutting the capabilities of our Reserves. If confirmed, this is a concern that I will follow closely.

Question. What is your understanding of the need for additional force shaping tools requiring legislation beyond what Congress has provided the past 2 years?

Answer. The Department has been granted the Total Force shaping tools necessary to meet the drawdown in its current plan. However, continued budget reductions may make it necessary to revisit the size of all components of the Total Force—Active Duty military, Reserve component military, DOD civilians, and contractors. Future assessment may require requesting additional congressional authorization for force shaping tools to meet reduced end strengths.

MEDICAL PERSONNEL RECRUITING AND RETENTION

Question. DOD continues to face shortages in some critically needed specialty medical personnel in both the Active and Reserve components. A recent USA Today article asserts that over 3,000 civilian medical doctors, nurses, and other health workers decided to leave their jobs this year during the period of time when furloughs were either being threatened or being carried out.

What is your understanding of the current shortages of health care professionals in DOD, the true effects of sequestration on the retention of medical professionals, and the sufficiency of plans to meet recruiting and retention goals?

Answer. DOD is in the midst of evaluating ongoing requirements for medical professionals in the context of a military drawdown and a modernization study. Preliminary information from the Army indicates civilian losses may have increased to a rate of 2–3 times greater than expected during the period of sequestration-related furloughs. We are polling all of the Services to see whether this trend is more widespread, and plan to continue monitoring medical personnel losses as related to Military Health System needs.

Question. What legislative and policy initiatives, including bonuses and special pays, do you think may be necessary to ensure that the Military Services can continue to meet medical support requirements?

Answer. With the Authority to Consolidate Special Pay provided by the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2008, we have adequate financial tools to improve retention and recruitment of our uniformed health professions officers. We have some flexibility to improve compensation for our uniformed providers, if needed, under current authorities. For non-uniformed military civilian physicians, we have the Physicians and Dentists Pay Plan (PDPP). The PDPP allows us to compensate our physicians and dentists at rates consistent with VA because we are allowed to use their pay table under delegation agreement by OPM. The agreement is not limited to physicians and dentists. We will closely monitor health compensation trends and coordinate with other Federal agencies, to see if we must make adjustments to our future pay plans.

MILITARY ACCESSIONS VITAL TO NATIONAL INTEREST PROGRAM

Question. Under the Military Accessions Vital to National Interest (MAVNI) program, the Services may recruit non-permanent resident aliens who have certain high-demand medical or linguistic skills for service in the armed forces, and offer them an expedited path to citizenship. Although the Services have enjoyed extraordinary recruiting and retention in recent years, some specialties remain under strength. While limited in scope, the program appeared successful and worthy of expansion, but was halted after the initial quota was reached so the Department could assess its utility and perform a security review. The program was to restart last summer for 2 additional years.

What is the status of the MAVNI program?

Answer. The MAVNI program was reinstated in May 2012 following required security reviews by Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence. The pilot will continue through fiscal year 2014.

Question. How many individuals have been recruited under the program since its restart, and in what occupations?

Answer. Since the program reopened in May 2012, Army has recruited 43 healthcare professionals and 1,024 critical language speakers.

MEDICAL MARIJUANA

Question. What is your assessment on the need for legitimate scientific study of the efficacy of medical marijuana in alleviating the symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) experienced by servicemembers and veterans?

Answer. DOD does not have any plans to sponsor research on the use of marijuana to treat wounded, ill, or injured servicemembers. The Army Medical Research and Materiel Command, which leads our Defense Health Program PTSD research, has not reviewed any proposals to investigate the use of marijuana for the treatment of PTSD. However, it is important to understand that for research studies to be helpful, they must be rigorously designed, scientifically sound, and meet the requirements for the protection of human subjects. If research were proposed that met these criteria, was feasible, and was aligned with programmatic requirements, then the study would be considered. DOD is supportive of any scientifically rigorous, lawful research efforts that have the potential to help improve the lives of patients who have been adversely affected by PTSD.

MOBILIZATION AND DEMOBILIZATION OF NATIONAL GUARD AND RESERVES

Question. Over the past 12 years, the National Guard and Reserves have experienced their largest and most sustained employment since World War II. Numerous problems arose in the planning and procedures for mobilization and demobilization, e.g., inadequate health screening and medical readiness, monitoring, antiquated pay systems, limited transition assistance programs upon demobilization, and lack of access to members of the Individual Ready Reserve. Reserve Force management policies and systems have been characterized in the past as "inefficient and rigid" and readiness levels have been adversely affected by equipment stay-behind, cross-leveling, and reset policies.

What is your assessment of advances made in improving Reserve component mobilization and demobilization procedures, and in what areas do problems still exist?

Answer. Over the past 12 years, the Department has implemented policy changes governing the utilization of the Guard and Reserves and expanded pre- and post-benefits for Active Duty periods which have served to enhance predictability and morale among servicemembers. Providing Reserve component personnel the ability to anticipate and plan for periods of utilization as well as periods of inactive duty at home contributes to readiness and improves communication among servicemembers, their families and employers.

Question. What do you consider to be the most significant enduring changes to the administration of the Reserve components aimed at ensuring their readiness for future mobilization requirements?

Answer. Significant enduring changes include the new title 10, section 12304b mobilization authority provided by Congress in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012, enabling continued focus on readiness and Reserve component (RC) utilization for non-named contingencies. Other enduring features include the exceptional RC performance record and support of the American people and employers. In my opinion, the readiness for future mobilization by Reserve and National Guard members has its greatest support in the actions of the American people and employers. This willingness has been borne through the long-term adoption of standardized policies and procedures governing Reserve mobilization combined with adequate dwell periods that have served to increase confidence and overall morale on the part of servicemembers and their families.

Question. Do you see a need to modify current statutory authorities for the mobilization of members of the National Guard and Reserves?

Answer. Current authorities are appropriate, and enable effective National Guard and Reserve utilization. I appreciate the authorities and support this committee has provided in this matter.

Question. What is your assessment of DOD programs to assist members of the National Guard and Reserves as they transition from a mobilized status?

Answer. Predictability and open communications are two key elements in the sustainment of readiness and morale of Reserve component servicemembers and their families. Since 2008, the Yellow Ribbon Reintegration Program (YRRP) has provided invaluable deployment and reintegration support for the Reserve components. Its efforts, in collaboration with partners like Employer Support of the Guard and Reserve, Transition GPS (Goals, Plans, Success), the Department of Veterans Affairs and the community-based network of care, provide information, access, referrals and outreach to military members, their families, employers, and immediate support network.

ENHANCED RESERVE MOBILIZATION AUTHORITIES

Question. In the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012, Congress authorized the Service Secretaries to mobilize units and individuals in support of pre-planned combatant command missions for up to 365 consecutive days. In the current defense strategy, the President and Secretary of Defense have stated that while conventional ground forces will be reduced, Special Forces will be increased over the next 5 years, and a key component of the new strategy seems to be the establishment of a rotational presence in Europe, the Middle East, and anywhere U.S. interests are threatened. Some in the press have called this a "lily pad" approach, and it potentially dovetails with an operational view of the Reserve components.

What is your assessment of the operational reserve and how it will fit into this paradigm of smaller, more lethal forces rotating into and out of many locations of strategic interest?

Answer. The operational reserve has a role in a paradigm of smaller, more lethal rotational forces. Services should fully leverage the new authorities that allow for planned Reserve component mobilizations when making decisions on restructuring and employing their forces. Utilization of the Guard and Reserve in the rotational support to COCOMs will not only reduce the infrastructure required of a permanent presence in theater but also relieve stress on the Total Force, thereby making the Reserve component an economical and viable partner in the force mix. I consider this critical to sustaining the readiness that we have achieved in the past 12 years.

Question. What is your understanding of the appropriate size and makeup of the Reserve components in light of the defense strategy?

Answer. The Department continues to coordinate closely with the Services to determine the correct/appropriate mix. Both Active and Reserve component forces are essential to supporting the national defense strategy, and the Reserve components continue to provide trained, ready, and cost-effective forces that can be employed on a regular operational basis, while also ensuring strategic depth for large-scale contingencies or other catastrophic national crises. The Department will further examine the appropriate size and makeup over the next several months during the Quadrennial Defense Review and the fiscal year 2015 program reviews.

MILITARY QUALITY OF LIFE

Question. The committee is concerned about the sustainment of key quality of life programs for military families, such as family support, child care, education, employment support, health care, and morale, welfare, and recreation services, especially as DOD's budget declines.

How do you perceive the relationship between military recruitment and retention and quality of life programs and your own top priorities for the Armed Forces?

Answer. The emphasis and resources the Department dedicates to our quality of life programs reflect the importance we place on our most valuable resource—our people. If I am confirmed, the programs that support our people will remain one of my top priorities. If we do not care for our people, our ability to continue to recruit and retain the best America has to offer will become increasingly more challenging.

Question. If confirmed, what military qualify of life programs would you consider a priority, and how do you envision working with the Services, combatant commanders, family advocacy groups, and Congress to sustain them?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to focus on the well-being and resilience of our servicemembers, their families, and their survivors, including access to nonmedical counseling programs such as Military OneSource and Military and Family Life Counselors aimed at preventing the development or exacerbation of mental health conditions that detract from military and family readiness. I will also promote Morale, Welfare, and Recreation fitness opportunities and child care support to help minimize stress on the force. The Department leadership is working together with advocacy groups and Congress to efficiently close gaps and reduce overlaps in programs and to communicate effectively to ensure that families know how to access available support when they need it.

FAMILY READINESS AND SUPPORT

Question. Servicemembers and their families in both the Active and Reserve components have made, and continue to make, tremendous sacrifices in support of operational deployments. Senior military leaders have warned of concerns among military families as a result of the stress of deployments and the separations that go with them.

What do you consider to be the most important family readiness issues for servicemembers and their families, and, if confirmed, how would you ensure that family readiness needs are addressed and adequately resourced?

Answer. The most important family readiness issue for servicemembers and their families is ensuring that we continue to deliver the support they need at the right time using the most effective method. Following 12 years of war and the impending surge of servicemembers transitioning from military to civilian life, it is critically important that servicemembers, their families, and their survivors receive information about available support services and resources, when they need it, through communication vehicles they prefer and trust. Therefore, we must leverage technology as a means to communicate and engage our families. It is imperative that the Department continues outreach, education, awareness and engagement strategies to promote servicemember and family readiness programs. If confirmed, I will continue to be a strong advocate to ensure family support programs are properly resourced and effectively managed in DOD.

Question. How would you address these family readiness needs in light of global rebasing, BRAC, deployments, and future reductions in end strength?

Answer. I will continue to work closely with the Services to identify and deliver the right balance of family readiness programs and support when and where it is needed. Our ongoing mission is to enable services, staff, and resources to be surged or evolved, as needed, to respond swiftly and effectively to the changing needs of servicemembers and their families during peacetime, war, periods of force structure change, relocation of military units, base realignment and closure, crisis, natural disaster, and other emergency situations. Sharing information with the Services on family support needs and best practices to address them will ensure that we continue to provide timely support while finding the most effective and efficient ways of doing so.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure support is provided to Reserve component families related to mobilization, deployment and family readiness, as well as to Active Duty families who do not reside near a military installation?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the Services and the National Guard Bureau to ensure that we continue to be responsive to the needs of geographically dispersed military families to include those who serve in the Reserve component. The Joint Family Support Assistance Program that began in 2007 continues to lead our support efforts to this population. While the frequency and tempo of Reserve component deployments may slow, we know that the needs of these families will continue to emerge and evolve. For that reason, part of our work through the Joint Family Support Assistance Program entails building capacity to identify and meet evolving needs at the local community level where these families live, work, and attend school, focusing on local institutions they naturally turn to for support when they need it. To augment and enable that local support, Military OneSource will continue to provide support to all military families, military leadership, and military and civilian service providers through delivery of information, referrals, and non-medical counseling.

Question. If confirmed, what steps will you take to sustain family support programs, given current fiscal constraints?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to encourage the implementation of flexible family support programs that communicate and coordinate with interagency and nongovernmental family services to meet the enduring needs of our servicemembers and their families whether they live on, near, or far from military installations.

Question. In your view, does the U.S. Special Operations Command have unique family readiness and support requirements? If so, in your view, are those needs adequately being met by each of the Military Services at this time? If they are not adequately being addressed, if confirmed, how would you address these unique needs?

Answer. We expect U.S. Special Operations Command's operating tempo will continue to be significant as their units continue to deploy throughout the world conducting joint missions. If confirmed, I will work with SOCOM to identify family support requirements that are unique to this community, offer an analysis of current support provided by the Services, and identify gaps in family support provided to the SOF community

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE SCHOOLS IN CONUS

Question. Some have questioned the continuing need for DOD-operated schools for military dependent children within the continental United States (CONUS).

In light of the administration's request for additional Base Realignment and Closure authorities and fiscal constraints, should DOD establish or update its criteria for the continued operation of DOD schools within CONUS?

Answer. The President and the Department view preserving and strengthening military families as critical to our national security. Military families bear an extraordinary burden for our freedom and education is a critical quality of life factor affecting readiness and retention.

DOD is committed to providing educational opportunities for all military children—balancing quality and cost while exploring all options and alternatives.

Therefore, the Department is in the process of commencing a study to evaluate the mission of continuing the operation of DOD schools within CONUS. The study will examine and provide alternatives that most effectively balance cost and quality considerations for the education of kindergarten through 12th grade students at 15 CONUS installations where the Department operates schools or contracts the education for military dependents. DOD Schools in Guam and Puerto Rico are not included in this study.

Question. If so, and if confirmed, how would you approach this task?

Answer. The Department is currently evaluating the need to continue the mission of DOD Schools in the United States. This comprehensive, deliberate, and objective study will include input from all stakeholders. The study will consider the full range of options for meeting the elementary and secondary educational needs of military dependents. We owe it to our military families to ensure that the decisions concerning the education of our military-connected children are the result of sound research findings. The research findings and recommendations will be reviewed by OSD senior officials, in consultation with the Military Departments. If confirmed, I look forward to discussing the recommendations of the study with you.

OFFICE OF COMMUNITY SUPPORT FOR MILITARY FAMILIES WITH SPECIAL NEEDS

Question. In the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2010, Congress required the establishment of an Office of Community Support for Military Families with Special Needs within the Office of the USD(P&R). The purpose of this office is to enhance and improve DOD support for military families with special needs, whether educational or medical in nature.

In your view, what should be the priorities of this Office of Community Support for Military Families with Special Needs?

Answer. A key priority for the Office of Community Support for Military Families with Special Needs should be and is to strengthen personal readiness for military families with special needs through a comprehensive policy, oversight of programs that support military families with special needs, identification of gaps in services to such families, and the accessibility to appropriate resources. Presently, over 126,000 military family members are enrolled in the Exceptional Family Member Program (EFMP). The EFMP supports military families with special medical and/or educational needs in three component areas: identification/enrollment, assignment coordination to determine the availability of services at a projected location, and family support to help families identify and access programs and services.

The Department has recently completed a detailed functional analysis of the EFMP to standardize the three components of the Program across the Military Services. Standardization will enable military families with special needs to have the same level of access to services in the three areas of the EFMP regardless of Service affiliation and location (for example, at a joint or sister Service installation).

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure outreach to those military families with special needs dependents so they are able to obtain the support they need?

Answer. Communication with military families with special needs and the provision of information about the EFMP is a major focus of DOD. If confirmed, I will continue ensure that we implement a comprehensive communication and marketing plan designed to deliver consistent information about the EFMP to families, service providers, and leadership. We will also continue to solicit input from families through a variety of outreach methods.

VOLUNTARY EDUCATION PROGRAMS

Question. The Department continues to seek ways to improve oversight of its tuition assistance programs, including standardizing eligibility criteria among the Services and requiring all schools who accept tuition assistance funding, whether for online courses or on-post, to sign a Memorandum of Understanding with the Department which will, among other things, subject online schools to Departmental audits.

What is your assessment of the tuition assistance program in light of the needs of the Services and the current budget environment?

Answer. The Tuition Assistance program is important to DOD because it enables the professional and personal development of our servicemembers and facilitates their transition to the civilian workforce when they are ready to leave the military. If confirmed, I will work with the Services to sustain the appropriate level of resources for this program.

Question. What is your view of tuition assistance as a transition benefit for servicemembers to obtain civilian licenses and credentials?

Answer. The Tuition Assistance program currently facilitates the transition of our servicemembers to the civilian workforce after they separate or retire. In 2012, over 47,000 servicemembers earned college degrees which are especially important to those servicemembers whose military specialty does not have a direct civilian counterpart. In addition, Tuition Assistance supports the academic coursework in preparation for any exams required of specific certifications or licenses, and over 1,700 servicemembers earned certificates that were not related to a degree program. All of these were from institutions of higher learning accredited by an accrediting body recognized by the Department of Education.

Question. What is your view of proposed changes to the so-called 90/10 rule that would require academic institutions to derive no more than 85 percent of their revenue from Federal sources, including DOD tuition assistance and VA GI Bill funding?

Answer. I have no objection to the proposal to include title 10 Tuition Assistance funds in the Federal portion of the 90/10 calculation. However, it is appropriate for technical assistance and oversight of any statutory changes to the proposed 90/10 rule to reside with the Department of Education.

MEDICAL RESEARCH PROGRAMS

Question. What do you see as the highest priority medical research investment areas for DOD?

Answer. The highest priority areas of medical research investments are: hemorrhage control and resuscitation; traumatic brain injury diagnosis and treatment; Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder prevention, diagnosis, and treatment; suicide prevention and intervention; and rehabilitation and regenerative medicine.

Question. How will you assess the amount of investment made in these research areas to determine if they are sufficient to meet DOD goals and requirements?

Answer. The Military Health System has implemented a plan to conduct annual reviews and analyses of the different research portfolios, ensuring research efforts are aligned to capability gaps and requirements, assessing the current state of research and science, and identifying research gaps and needs that require future funding strategies to achieve DOD goals.

Question. How will you ensure that DOD medical research efforts are well coordinated with similar research programs within the private sector, academia, the Services, DARPA, the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the National Institutes of Health?

Answer. Critical to the development of our medical research investment strategy is an understanding of the related research activities in other Federal agencies. This is accomplished by annual joint reviews of Federal-agency-specific research portfolios in which research investments and results are presented and shared to best inform future DOD research investments. Agency participation includes the DOD, the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Department of Education, and the National Institutes of Health.

Question. How will you ensure that new medical technologies (including drugs and vaccines) are independently and adequately tested before their use by DOD organizations and personnel?

Answer. DOD requires that products be used in a manner consistent with FDA rules and procedures. The ASD(HA), under the USD(P&R) direction, has the primary responsibility for the oversight of this policy's compliance.

Question. There have been growing privacy and security concerns raised about the use of online social networks for medical research purposes.

How will you ensure that the increasing use of social networking media for medical research purposes will protect the privacy and security of patients?

Answer. The Department has policies in place that ensure that DOD conducted, contracted, sponsored, supported, or managed research involving human subjects is conducted in accordance with Federal, DOD, and international regulatory requirements. Research protocols, including internet research protocols, must be reviewed and approved by Institutional Review Boards, and privacy protection is a key element of that review. At present, there is no DOD policy regarding the protection of privacy for internet research beyond the current privacy protections for human subjects of research. The ASD (Research & Engineering) who is the DOD lead for the human research protection portfolio intends to update the policy that governs human research protection to include a section on internet research (including recruitment of subjects as well as collection of data).

Question. What are your biggest concerns related to the DOD medical research enterprise?

Answer. The biggest concern is the impact of instability of medical research funding due to budget uncertainty. Stability and thoughtful management in medical research funding are necessary to maintain a robust scientific community to improve health care outcomes in the vital areas of hemorrhage control and resuscitation, traumatic brain injury, post-traumatic stress disorder, suicide prevention, extremity injury and amputee care and rehabilitation.

MORALE, WELFARE, AND RECREATION

Question. Morale, welfare, and recreation (MWR) programs are critical to enhancement of military life for members and their families, especially in light of deployments. These programs should be relevant and attractive to all eligible users, including Active Duty and Reserve personnel, retirees, and their families.

What challenges do you foresee in sustaining MWR programs, particularly in view of the current fiscal environment and, if confirmed, are there any improvements you would seek to achieve?

Answer. Changes in our basing, deployment patterns and force structure will continue to have a significant impact on our ability to deliver quality of life programs to our military families. With more than 75 percent of military families now living off installation, there is an increasing need for partnerships and support from local governments, school systems, and businesses to ensure we continue to provide comprehensive, accessible, and affordable quality of life programs. Additionally, we are conducting a major assessment of MWR programs to ensure they are being operated in as efficient and cost-effective manner as possible.

The continued vitality and relevance of MWR programs depend on sound management, meeting command and customer needs, a predictable stream of non-appropriated revenue and solid appropriated fund support of mission essential and community support programs. We must develop and maintain a strong network of community-based providers and maximize our information and referral resources through internet and social networking avenues. We also have the opportunity to improve the effectiveness of outreach programs, to better meet military families where they live. If confirmed, I will evaluate these opportunities, and how we can better coordinate efforts among the various entities providing support to our military members and their families.

COMMISSARY AND MILITARY EXCHANGE SYSTEMS

Question. Commissary and military exchange systems are significant quality of life components for members of the Active and Reserve Forces, retirees, and their families.

What is your view of the need for modernization of business policies and practices in the commissary and exchange systems, and what do you view as the most promising avenues for change to achieve modernization goals?

Answer. Both the Defense Commissary Agency (DeCA) and the military exchanges are progressive organizations seeking to reduce costs within their respective businesses. DeCA, for example, has a proven history of reducing the costs of the commissary system without decreasing the value of the benefit provided. Since its beginning in 1991, efficiencies have allowed DeCA to reduce its workforce by 6,700 full time equivalent positions and operating costs by approximately $1.4 billion in constant fiscal year 1992 dollars, which include savings due to BRAC closures and inventory reduction. In fact, when measured in constant dollars, DeCA's operating costs are only slightly more than one-half of what they were when the Agency was created.

Today's exchanges have gone beyond the traditional brick and mortar environment, embracing e-commerce and mobile retail channels to satisfy customer demands. The exchanges continue to exceed the DOD Social Compact on savings for servicemembers. For the Exchanges, there are mechanisms for modernization through the Cooperative Efforts Board. Promising areas for change include non-resale procurement, logistics and distribution, exchange select/private label, and seasonal and one time buys. If confirmed, I will continue to look for ways to modernize business policies and find efficiencies in the commissary and exchange systems.

Question. What is your view of the proposals by some to consolidate or eliminate Commissaries and Exchanges in certain areas where they are underused or duplicative of services readily available at reasonable cost in the community?

Answer. If confirmed, I would review any proposals aimed at reducing overhead, which may include closing underutilized locations or eliminating duplicative services. I recognize that commissary and exchange programs are an important element of the servicemembers' compensation package and contribute to the quality of life of military personnel and their families. In fact, commissaries are repeatedly rated by military personnel as one of their most valued non-pay benefits. Selling groceries at cost means that the customer pays the same price DeCA pays its supplier plus a 5 percent surcharge which pays for replacing, maintaining, and renovating commissaries.

There are currently 247 commissaries; 55 percent of these commissaries are small stores located in remote or overseas locations, but they account for only 20 percent of sales. These stores are often the most appreciated stores because there are generally limited options available outside the gate of the military installation. With over 98 million shopper visits annually and approximately $6 billion in sales it is evident that people are using this benefit. Eliminating commissaries in some areas may be possible but we must fully appreciate the impacts on the servicemembers and the community Question. In the Ronald W. Reagan NDAA for Fiscal Year 2005, Congress required the Secretary of Defense to establish an executive governing body for the commissary and exchange systems to ensure the complementary operation of the two systems.

What is your understanding of the purpose and composition of the executive governing body?

Answer. To fulfill the requirement of the law, the Department established the DOD Executive Resale Board as the governing body to provide advice to the USD(P&R) regarding the complementary operation of the commissary and exchange systems. The Board reviews and advises on cross-functional matters important to the military resale system. The Board is invaluable in leading cooperative efforts and resolving issues of concern resulting in increased efficiency and effectiveness of the overall system.

The Board is chaired by the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management, and members include both the senior military officers and civilians who oversee and manage the commissary and exchanges systems.

Question. If confirmed, what would your role be with respect to the governing body, and what would your expectations be for its role?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure the Board meets regularly to review operational areas of mutual interest to the military resale system.

CIVILIAN PERSONNEL SYSTEMS

Question. Section 1113 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2010 provides DOD with extensive personnel flexibilities for its civilian employees that are not available to other agencies. In particular, section 9902(a) of title 5, U.S.C., as added by section 1113, directs the Department to establish a new performance management system for all of its employees. Section 9902(b) directs the Department to develop a streamlined new hiring system that is designed to better fulfill DOD's mission needs, produce high-quality applicants, and support timely personnel decisions.

What is your understanding of the current status of the Department's efforts to implement the authority provided by section 1113?

Answer. The Department's plans for the performance management system, workforce incentives, and hiring flexibilities were informed by recommendations developed by DOD employees, supervisors, and managers representing labor and management from across the Department and submitted to the Armed Services Committees at the end of March 2013. The collaborative labor-management pre-decisional recommendations for the personnel authorities were widely adopted by the Department.

The Department continues to make good progress on the personnel authorities. We are developing the new appraisal system, which will be a multi-level rating pattern characterized by a uniform appraisal period for covered employees, and the ability to make meaningful distinctions in levels of performance. If confirmed, I will continue to support the work that is underway to comply with statute.

Question. If confirmed, will you make it a priority to implement these flexibilities in a manner that best meets the needs of the Department and promotes the quality of the Department's civilian workforce?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I will make it my priority to implement those flexibilities that would promote the quality of the Department's civilian workforce to ensure accomplishment of the Department's missions.

Question. Section 1112 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2010 directs the Department to develop a Defense Civilian Leadership Program (DCLP) to recruit, train, and advance a new generation of civilian leaders for the Department. Section 1112 provides the Department with the full range of authorities available for demonstration programs under section 4703 of title 5, U.S.C., including the authority to compensate participants on the basis of qualifications, performance, and market conditions. These flexibilities are not otherwise available to DOD.

Do you agree that the Department needs to recruit highly qualified civilian personnel to meet the growing needs of its acquisition, technical, business, and financial communities?

Answer. I completely agree that recruiting highly qualified civilian personnel both in mission critical occupations, such as acquisition, information technology, and financial management, and in leadership positions across the Department is essential to mission success.

Question. In your view, has the existing civilian hiring process been successful in recruiting such personnel and meeting these needs?

Answer. Although I believe the Department currently has a highly talented workforce, I wholeheartedly support the initiatives to streamline the civilian hiring process. The Department embraces a simplified, transparent hiring system that meets the needs of stakeholders, attracts quality candidates, and reduces fill-time. We are making progress, but there is still work to be done in this area. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department continues to actively engage in aggressively pursuing continued improvements in the civilian hiring process.

Question. If confirmed, will you make it a priority to implement the authority provided by section 1112 in a manner that best meets the needs of the Department and promotes the quality of the Department's civilian workforce?

Answer. If confirmed, I will make it a priority to implement the authority provided by section 1112. The Department recognizes the need for a sound leader-development model to attract, retain, and develop civilian leaders to support pipeline readiness, enhance bench strength, and promote the quality of the Department's civilian workforce. The Department has successfully completed two pilot cohorts under the authority provided in section 1112 from which approximately 240 leaders have graduated, and who are now credentialed to lead teams and projects. If confirmed, I will continue implementing the authority provided to ensure a successful framework for developing the next generation of innovative leaders to meet the Department's future needs.

HUMAN CAPITAL PLANNING

Question. Section 115b of title 10, U.S.C., as added by section 1108 of the NDAA for 2010, requires the Secretary of Defense to develop and update in every even-numbered year a strategic human capital plan that specifically identifies gaps in the Department's civilian workforce and strategies for addressing those gaps. Section 115b requires that the plan include chapters specifically addressing the Department's senior management, functional, and technical workforce and the Department's acquisition workforce.

Would you agree that a strategic human capital plan that identifies gaps in the workforce and strategies for addressing those gaps is a key step toward ensuring that the Department has the skills and capabilities needed to meet future challenges?

Answer. Yes. I believe such planning would well position the Department to acquire, develop, and maintain the workforce it needs to meet current and future mission challenges.

Question. Do you see the need for any changes in the requirements for a strategic human capital plan under section 115b?

Answer. At this time we appreciate the help of past legislation that put the Department on a biennial reporting cycle. We continue to progress on meeting the requirements for a strategic human capital plan under section 115b, and will continue to institutionalize our processes and assess the need for any changes as we continue in this important endeavor.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that DOD fully complies with these requirements?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I will continue to work toward ensuring the Department fully complies with statutory strategic workforce planning requirements.

Question. Since the time that the Department's most recent strategic human capital plan was issued, its civilian workforce plans have been significantly altered by the changed budget environment and extensive efficiencies initiatives.

What role do you believe human capital planning should play in determining where reductions in the civilian workforce can be taken with the lowest level of risk?

Answer. Any reductions in the civilian workforce should be informed by the Department's long-term strategic workforce plan to determine where reductions can be taken with the lowest level of risk, with the understanding that short-term exceptions may be necessary due to emerging dynamics in the budget environment. Forecasts for the Department's workforce must be based on validated mission requirements and workload, both current and projected, and any reductions in the civilian workforce must be made in the context of the Total Force and directly linked to workload so as to not adversely impact overall mission capabilities.

Question. Would you agree that the strategic human capital plan required by section 115b should be updated to more accurately reflect the Department's current workforce plans and requirements?

Answer. Yes. The plan should be updated to be more aligned and integrated with the Department's programing and budget process, and meet the requirements for a total force mix and competencies assessments. In preparing for fiscal year 2013 through 2018, we conducted a pilot study that examined the total force mix based on the workforce requirement and relationships in high risk mission critical occupations. We are also testing and preparing to launch a tool to collect competency gap information that will lead to strategies to mitigate identified gaps. These processes will take several planning cycles, and functional communities are preparing for further assessment and implementation.

Question. What steps if any will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that civilian workforce levels are determined on the basis of careful planning and long-term requirements, rather than by arbitrary goals or targets?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to emphasize that civilian workforce levels must be planned based on long-term strategic planning requirements. Forecasts for the Department's workforce must be based on validated mission requirements and directly linked to workload so as to not adversely impact overall mission capabilities.

DOD CIVILIAN PERSONNEL WORKFORCE

Question. Section 955 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 required the Secretary of Defense to develop a plan to reduce the size of the civilian personnel workforce by 5 percent over the next 5 years. The plan developed by the Secretary does not meet this objective. Since the time that section 955 was enacted, the Department has implemented hiring freezes and furloughs as a result of sequestration. As a result, the DOD civilian personnel workforce is substantially smaller than it was on the date of enactment or at the time the plan was submitted.

Do you agree that DOD's civilian employee workforce plays a vital role in the functioning of the Department?

Answer. Yes, the DOD's civilian employee workforce plays an instrumental role in the functioning of the Department as part of the Total Force across a range of missions. The civilian workforce performs key enabling functions for the military, such as critical training and preparation to ensure readiness, equipment reset and modernization. Civilians also provide medical care, family support, and base operating services—all vital to supporting our men and women in uniform. Additionally, civilians are on the "front lines" supporting missions such as intelligence, cyber, reconstruction, and security force assistance.

Question. Do you agree that if sequestration continues through fiscal year 2014 and beyond, the Department will need to further reduce the size of its civilian workforce?

Answer. While there is some flexibility afforded the Department in managing the steep reductions to the budget required by sequestration, the across the board impact of those reductions would likely require the Department to further decrease the size of its civilian workforce. If confirmed, and to the extent allowed by the sequester, I will work to ensure that any reductions to the civilian workforce are balanced and executed in the context of the Department's Total Force management principles, ensuring the appropriate and most cost effective alignment of work.

Question. In your view, would it be preferable for the Department to make planned, prioritized reductions to its civilian workforce, or to continue with arbitrary reductions based on hiring freezes and workforce attrition?

Answer. Planned and prioritized reductions to the civilian workforce are preferred, such as those reflected in the Department's budget request for fiscal year 2014. Those proposed reductions were based on a comprehensive workforce to workload analysis. Unfortunately, the across the board impact of the sequester along with continued budget uncertainty surrounding the Department's annual appropriations request has resulted in the need to take extraordinary actions, such as the implementation of hiring freezes and furloughs.

BALANCE BETWEEN CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES AND CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEES

Question. In recent years, DOD has become increasingly reliant on services provided by contractors. As a result of the explosive growth in service contracts, contractors now play an integral role in the performance of functions that were once performed exclusively by government employees, including the management and oversight of weapons programs, the development of policies, the development of public relations strategies, and even the collection and analysis of intelligence. In many cases, contractor employees work in the same offices, serve on the same projects and task forces, and perform many of the same functions as Federal employees.

Do you believe that the current balance between civilian employees and contractor employees is in the best interests of DOD?

Answer. I believe the Department must have a properly sized and highly capable civilian workforce that guards against an erosion of critical, organic skills and an overreliance on contracted services, particularly in such areas as acquisition program management, information technology, and financial management. If confirmed, I will continue to support the administration's and Department's focus on reducing inappropriate or excessive reliance on contracted support, particularly for work that is critical in nature or closely associated with inherently governmental functions.

Question. What steps if any will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that DOD is not excessively reliant on contractors to perform its basic functions?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to support the administration's and Department's focus on gaining a better accounting of contracted services. We will review such services annually and reduce inappropriate, excessive, or more costly reliance on such services. This is of particular importance in instances where contractors are found to be performing work that is critical in nature or closely associated with inherently governmental functions.

Question. Section 2330a of title 10, U.S.C., requires DOD to maintain an inventory of contract services. Section 321 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2011 amended this provision to give the USD(P&R) a key role in implementing this provision.

What is your understanding of the current status of the Department's efforts to implement the requirements of section 2330a?

Answer. Since 2011, the Department has made significant improvements to its Inventory of Contracts for Services to implement the requirements of title 10, U.S.C., section 2330a. Specifically, we have improved the accuracy of the required data set by directing cross-functional (acquisition, financial management, manpower, and requiring activities) involvement in the process. We have issued data collection guidance and, as recommended by Congress and deployed the Army's proven Contractor Manpower Reporting Application software across the entire Department. We have also issued specific guidance on how components are to review their inventories in order to reduce inappropriate, excessive, or more costly reliance on contract services. Also, beginning in fiscal year 2014, contractors supporting all components will be able to report their labor dollars and related cost information, as required by law. We still have more to do. If I am confirmed, in order to make the best use of our resources, we will continue working with AT&L to improve visibility and accountability of contracts for services.

Question. What additional steps if any will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that the Department fully implements the requirements of section 2330a?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue working with my colleagues in AT&L and Comptroller to improve visibility and accountability of our contracted services as required by title 10, U.S.C. section 2330a. We will soon finalize a governing instruction for managing contract services as a part of the Total Force, and, as requested by Congress, implement across DOD the Army's standardized service contract approval process to be used when considering funding contract support. I will also continue to work, as requested by Congress, on implementing the Army's automated Contract Manpower Reporting Application across the Department, which will help ensure a comprehensive inventory review and permit component heads to make greatly improved budget projections for contracted services.

ACQUISITION WORKFORCE

Question. Section 852 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2008 established an Acquisition Workforce Development Fund to help DOD address shortcomings in its acquisition workforce. The fund provides a continuing source of funds for this purpose.

Do you believe that the DOD acquisition workforce development fund is still needed to ensure that DOD has the right number of employees with the right skills to run its acquisition programs in the most cost effective manner for the taxpayers?

Answer. The acquisition workforce development fund has been instrumental in the Department's efforts to recapitalize its acquisition workforce and improve oversight, management, and accountability in the procurements of goods and services. The fund is still necessary to further enhance and sustain the training and expertise of our dedicated acquisition workforce.

Question. If confirmed, what steps if any will you take to ensure that the money made available through the workforce development fund is spent in a manner that best meets the needs of DOD and its acquisition workforce?

Answer. While the management and execution of the acquisition workforce development fund is a joint responsibility of AT&L and Comptroller, if confirmed, I will work with those offices to ensure that the application of resources is done in a manner that is consistent with the training, development, and sustainment needs of the acquisition workforce.

Question. Section 872 of the Ike Skelton NDAA for Fiscal Year 2011 codifies the authority for DOD to conduct an acquisition workforce demonstration project and extends the authority to 2017.

Do you believe it would be in the best interest of the Department to extend and expand the acquisition workforce demonstration project?

Answer. DOD components have expressed a strong interest in an expansion of the acquisition workforce demonstration project to better meet the workforce challenges they are facing under current budget constraints. Testing alternative personnel authorities and processes under these difficult conditions will be a true test of their effectiveness and I believe there is value in extending and expanding this demonstration project. Our role in P&R is to provide the warfighter and support staffs with the manpower and personnel authorities, processes and tools they need to enable them to carry out their missions. If confirmed, I will continue to work with and support AT&L in ensuring the demonstration project supports the needs of the components and mission of the Department.

Question. What steps would you take, if confirmed, to implement section 872?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the USD(AT&L) and other Department components to ensure the Department is effectively positioned to appropriately extend and expand the Acquisition Demonstration project.

GI BILL BENEFITS

Question. Congress passed the Post-9/11 Veterans Educational Assistance Act in 2008 ("Post-9/11 GI Bill) that created enhanced educational benefits for servicemembers who have served at least 90 days on Active Duty since September 11. The maximum benefit would roughly cover the cost of a college education at any public university in the country. One purpose of the act was to recognize and reward the service of those who served voluntarily after September 11, particularly those who do not serve full careers and qualify for retirement benefits.

What is your assessment of the impact of the Post-9/11 GI Bill on recruiting and retention, including the provision of transferability for continued service?

Answer. While the Post-9/11 GI Bill program is only 4 years old, there are strong indications the program has already had a profound, positive impact on recruiting and retention. In fact, as of September 4, 2013, over 368,875, career servicemembers have transferred their Post-9/11 GI Bill benefits to over 795,000 family members.

PERSONNEL POLICY IMPLEMENTATION

Question. What is your understanding of your responsibility, if confirmed, to inform and consult with this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress on the implementation of policies directed by law?

Answer. I understand that I must comply with all requirements to inform and consult with requisite congressional committees on the implementation of personnel and readiness policies as directed by law.

Question. What is your understanding of the Department's obligation and authority to implement personnel policies to improve efficiency within the Department?

Answer. I understand that the Department, under the direction of the Secretary, has both the authority and obligation to evaluate and implement personnel policies to improve efficiency within the Department. That these policies must not compromise mission readiness or essential support of the Total Force.

Question. What is your understanding on the timeframe in which personnel policies directed by law must be implemented by the Department?

Answer. I understand that personnel policies directed by law must be implemented by the Department in the timeliest manner possible given the available resources and while ensuring the most effective and efficient outcome for the Total Force.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the USD(P&R)?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CARL LEVIN

LIVING QUARTERS ALLOWANCE FOR CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES OVERSEAS

1. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Wright, the committee is aware that the Department of Defense (DOD) directed an audit of the pay accounts of many employees in overseas locations who were receiving a Living Quarters Allowance (LQA), and that the audit found that a total of 659 DOD civilian employees were erroneously paid LQA after having been hired overseas. While the authority to provide LQA is found in Department of State Standardized Regulations (DSSR), in a May 15, 2013 memo you announced that DOD would continue to provide LQA for up to 1 year for affected employees due to unusual circumstances. In addition, DOD is providing relief for past LQA debts if employees seek a waiver of indebtedness. Did DOD consider extending the waiver of recovery of an advance payment of LQA for unusual circumstances beyond the 1-year currently granted?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, we considered the LQA eligibility beyond the 1 year currently granted. However, we also considered that granting eligibility for LQA beyond that time could be viewed as an abuse of discretion with respect to taxpayer dollars being spent on incentives for which employees are otherwise ineligible. We believe that 1 year of LQA eligibility is a sufficient period for affected employees to make personal decisions in this situation.

2. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Wright, are there any legal impediments to providing such an extension for the duration of an employee's term overseas, and in your view, would it be appropriate to do so?

Ms. WRIGHT. Up to 1 year of temporary eligibility for LQA has been authorized as a means to provide adequate time for employees to make arrangements to adjust to the loss of LQA. Continuing beyond that period is not appropriate as the affected employees do not meet the standard eligibility criteria under the DSSR, DOD Instruction 1400.25, Volume 1250, or both.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JACK REED

MILITARY LENDING ACT

3. Senator REED. Secretary Wright, the Military Lending Act (MLA) authorizes the Secretary of Defense to write regulations defining the types of consumer credit products to which the law's 36 percent annual percentage rate cap applies, and DOD is currently in the process of updating its regulations to close loopholes. These loopholes, such as structuring a credit product as an open ended one, have allowed predatory lenders to evade the protections afforded to our servicemembers under the MLA and, in some cases, charge our servicemembers exorbitant triple digit effective interest rates. Are these predatory loans that currently fall out of the MLA's purview problematic in terms of assuring military readiness?

Ms. WRIGHT. Predatory lending and abusive lending practices compromise our readiness and are of great concern to the Department. The passage of the MLA curbed many abusive industry practices. We recognize, however, the credit market has changed since our initial regulation was published. The Department is, therefore, working closely with the prudential regulators including the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, and the Federal Trade Commission, along with other consumer and enforcement agencies. We are conducting a top to bottom review of our MLA rules, with a view towards strengthening the protections available to military families.

This rigorous interagency rulemaking process is being further informed by public comment and a survey of DOD personnel, legal assistance officers, and financial counselors to identify appropriate statutory, regulatory, and training responses to problematic practices. We anticipate the revised rule will be ready for public comment by the end of the calendar year. We are committed to directing servicemembers and their families away from potentially harmful credit products and towards educational, training, and personal counseling resources that the Department provides to support their financial stability.

4. Senator REED. Secretary Wright, do you agree that DOD should provide our servicemembers with the greatest level of protection under the MLA by closing these loopholes?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department has revisited and is revising these regulations to ensure servicemembers and veterans are protected against the credit products that they use most. We recognize the current definitions of credit in the regulation are no longer adequate to cover the products that are potentially causing concern. Accordingly, DOD has organized and led an interagency working group, including all of the prudential lenders, to review the regulation with a view toward strengthening protections for military consumers. This process is well underway and we are making substantial process.

Our rulemaking efforts are being further informed by public comment and a survey of DOD personnel, legal assistance officers, and financial counselors to identify appropriate statutory, regulatory, and training responses to problematic practices. Relying on this comprehensive data from our "boots-on-the-ground" subject matter experts in the field, we anticipate the revised rule will be ready for public comment by the end of the calendar year.

The Department is also fully engaged in educating servicemembers concerning their rights as consumers, so that they are familiar with their protections under Federal consumer law, the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act, and the MLA. Our efforts to educate servicemembers and their families center around installation readiness facilities, predeployment and redeployment process facilities, and Reserve component mobilization and demobilization processing centers. This comprehensive education and training is more sophisticated and detailed than it has even been. Therefore, we are confident that our interagency rulemaking process, combined with our ongoing financial readiness campaign, will provide greater safeguards for our servicemembers and their families against predatory and abusive lending practices.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BILL NELSON

LIVING QUARTERS ALLOWANCE

5. Senator NELSON. Secretary Wright, in response to the loss of overseas LQA for Government civilians, DOD offered those affected the opportunity to transfer to the United States under the Priority Placement Program (PPP). Can you confirm the priority placement level granted to the civilians affected by the erroneous payments of LQA?

Ms. WRIGHT. Affected employees are being enrolled in the PPP as Priority 3 registrants. Priority 3 is generally assigned to registrants who are not facing involuntary separation. Higher priority registrants are being involuntarily separated, i.e., losing employment altogether. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that 71 affected employees have registered in PPP, 4 have accepted job offers, and 1 has declined an offer.

We have taken additional steps for affected employees who choose to return State-side in the absence of LQA. Specifically, we have authorized a temporary exception to standard PPP clearance requirements that allows DOD components to reassign LQA-affected employees directly to State-side vacancies that would otherwise not be filled due to a hiring freeze. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that nine employees have accepted management-directed reassignments under this special exception.

6. Senator NELSON. Secretary Wright, does this category grant the affected constituents any advantages over civilians who are not affected by the LQA?

Ms. WRIGHT. Affected employees who choose to register in the PPP are registered as a Priority 3. Priority 3 is generally assigned to registrants who are not facing involuntary separation. Higher priority registrants are being involuntarily separated, i.e., losing employment altogether. Unlike other Priority 3 registrants, LQA-affected employees may register in the PPP at any time. In order to facilitate as many placements as possible, PPP registration procedures were modified to accelerate expansion of the registrant's area of referral. Further, the Department has authorized a temporary exception to standard PPP clearance requirements that allows DOD components to reassign LQA-affected employees directly to State-side vacancies that would otherwise not be filled due to a hiring freeze. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that nine employees have accepted management-directed reassignments under this special exception to PPP. Also, the components reported that 71 affected employees have registered in PPP, 4 have accepted job offers, and 1 has declined an offer.

7. Senator NELSON. Secretary Wright, in light of the sequester and hiring freeze, can DOD guarantee available positions for all who choose this option?

Ms. WRIGHT. In an effort to further mitigate the effects of LQA cessation, the Department has developed special PPP procedures to facilitate the timely rotation of those affected employees who choose to return Stateside in the absence of LQA. Most notably, we have authorized a temporary exception to standard PPP clearance requirements that allows DOD components to reassign LQA-affected employees directly to State-side vacancies that would otherwise not be filled due to a hiring freeze. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that nine employees have accepted management-directed reassignments under this special exception to PPP. In addition, the components have reported that 71 affected employees have registered in PPP, 4 have accepted job offers, and 1 has declined an offer.

8. Senator NELSON. Secretary Wright, will all affected constituents who participate in the PPP be able to do so by May 1, 2014?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes. We expect affected employees who indicate in a timely manner that they wish to return Stateside will be offered positions either through PPP or other DOD component reassignment action by May 1, 2014. Employees identified in the audit as receiving LQA erroneously who choose to return Stateside in the absence of LQA became eligible to register in the PPP on June 27, 2013. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components reported that 71 employees have registered in PPP, 4 have accepted job offers, and 1 has declined an offer. In addition to placement through PPP registration, the Department has authorized a temporary exception to standard PPP clearance requirements that allows DOD components to reassign LQA-affected employees directly to State-side vacancies that would otherwise not be filled due to a hiring freeze. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that nine employees have accepted management-directed reassignments under this special exception to PPP.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KAY R. HAGAN

CITIZEN SOLDIER SUPPORT PROGRAM

9. Senator HAGAN. Secretary Wright, section 706 of last year's National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) authorized the Secretary of Defense to carry out a pilot program to work with community partners on this critical health issue. We need to work with local authorities and local programs to more effectively tackle this problem. North Carolina has such a program—the Citizen Soldier Support Program. Can you please assure this committee that you will support and vigorously carry out this pilot program that was part of last year's NDAA?

Ms. WRIGHT. We greatly appreciate the intent of section 706 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 to improve the care for the National Guard and Reserve members through community partnership. The Department is actively working with the Departments of Veterans Affairs (VA) and Health and Human Services to respond to the President's Executive Order #13625, "Improving Access to Mental Health Services for Veterans, Servicemembers, and Military Families," dated August 31, 2012. Under the Executive order, the VA is developing enhanced partnerships and fielding pilot programs with community providers to enhance mental health services. In addition, DOD and the VA published a National Research Action Plan in August 2013, which, among other things, recommends strategies, evaluates current efforts, and ensures mental health providers in communities nationwide are trained in the most current evidence-based methodologies.

Due to severe budget limitations under the Budget Control Act, the Department has not made plans to initiate a separate competitive and merit-based award process for a new program under the discretionary authority of section 706.

LIVING QUARTERS ALLOWANCE

10. Senator SHAHEEN. Secretary Wright, please explain DOD's reason for not employing the "unusual circumstances" clause beyond May 1, 2014 to enable the 659 civilians to receive LQA until the end of their assignment or until DOD is able to place the person via PPP.

Ms. WRIGHT. While we consider that 1 year of LQA eligibility is a sufficient period for affected employees to make personal decisions concerning this situation, we also consider that granting LQA beyond that time could be viewed as an abuse of discretion with respect to taxpayer dollars being spent on incentives for which employees are otherwise ineligible. We expect that employees indicating in a timely manner their desire to return State-side will be placed before their LQA terminates.

11. Senator SHAHEEN. Secretary Wright, would DOD consider putting those affected into a higher PPP category than level 3? If not, please explain.

Ms. WRIGHT. Enrolling the affected employees with a higher priority was considered but not adopted. Priorities 1 and 2 in the PPP are reserved for employees who are being involuntarily separated through no fault of their own, which is not the case of employees identified in the audit as receiving LQA erroneously.

However, in an effort to mitigate the effects of LQA cessation, the Department has authorized a temporary exception to standard PPP clearance requirements that allows DOD components to reassign LQA-affected employees directly to State-side vacancies that would otherwise not be filled due to a hiring freeze. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that nine employees have accepted management-directed reassignments under this special exception to PPP. In addition, the components have reported that 71 affected employees have registered in PPP, 4 have accepted job offers, and 1 has declined an offer. The Department has also committed to re-evaluating these procedures, as needed, to determine if more aggressive measures are necessary to affect the return of these employees from overseas.

12. Senator SHAHEEN. Secretary Wright, please provide specifics regarding the mechanisms in place that would allow DOD to fill vacant positions during a hiring freeze. Are human resources (HR) professionals able to see those jobs listed and effectively match someone from this group to those jobs?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department has authorized a temporary exception to standard PPP clearance requirements that allows DOD components to reassign LQA-affected employees who choose to return Stateside in the absence of LQA directly to State-side vacancies that would otherwise not be filled due to a hiring freeze. Operational guidance regarding these PPP flexibilities was distributed to the Department's human resources community on June 27, 2013. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that nine employees have accepted management-directed reassignments under this special exception to PPP. In addition, the components reported that 71 affected employees have registered in PPP, 4 have accepted job offers, and 1 has declined an offer. DOD components are responsible for procedures that will result in assignments for their employees.

13. Senator SHAHEEN. Secretary Wright, other than being an LQA recipient, were there any additional parameters and guidelines used to select a target population for erroneous LQA?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes. By memorandum of January 3, 2013, I directed DOD components to complete an audit of the pay accounts of all locally hired employees currently receiving LQA.

14. Senator SHAHEEN. Secretary Wright, are the details of the audit publicly available to this group under the Freedom of Information Act?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, an employee may request the details of the audit as it affects the employee through the Freedom of Information Act process.

15. Senator SHAHEEN. Secretary Wright, has Thomas v. United States (September 7, 2011) played any role in how DOD is handling the current LQA issue?

Ms. WRIGHT. No. Thomas v. United States has not played a role in how the Department is addressing the LQA issue. However, we agree with the Thomas opinion that if an employee satisfies all the eligibility requirements for receiving LQA as established in the DSSR, as well as the supplemental criteria established by the DOD in its LQA regulations (DODI 1400.25, Volume 1250), that employee may be eligible to receive the incentive provided that the Department has made a determination that there is a need for the incentive. As noted in Roberts v. United States (April 30, 2012), the DSSR expressly delegates authority to heads of Federal agencies to implement additional regulations in this area. Under that delegation, the Secretary of Defense issued DOD Instruction 1400.25, volume 1250, which includes LQA eligibility conditions in addition to those outlined in the DSSR. In this situation, affected employees either did not meet the DSSR eligibility requirements, or those established in Volume 1250, or both.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KIRSTEN E. GILLIBRAND

AUTISM

16. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright, during our meeting we discussed the various options for care for special needs dependents, especially those on the autism spectrum. I consider this a readiness issue when we start to see servicemembers leave the military in order to find better care for their children. After our discussion I still have concerns with the level of commitment from TRICARE to adequately address the needs of our special needs dependents. If confirmed, do I have your commitment to work with me to reform and improve upon the way that TRICARE cares for special needs dependents?

Ms. WRIGHT. I agree that this is a readiness issues and, if confirmed, I will work closely with you and other Members of Congress on improving TRICARE programs for special needs dependents. DOD provides one of the most generous autism benefits in the United States through the TRICARE program. All TRICARE family members with a diagnosis of Autism Spectrum Disorder are eligible for autism services. Active Duty family members are also eligible for Applied Behavior Analysis (ABA) reinforcement under the ECHO Autism Demonstration.

I want to assure you that the Department fully recognizes that having a child diagnosed with autism can present significant challenges to any family and burden them with changes to nearly every aspect of daily family life. TRICARE will continue to pursue efforts to take care of our families with special needs and will proceed accordingly based on analysis of the best medical evidence available and the results of our own demonstration and pilot project.

17. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright, more than once I have heard the excuse that medical data is not available to prove the necessity of a specific autism treatment option that is routinely used in the civilian sector. Will you commit to reviewing the way TRICARE makes these determinations to ensure TRICARE is routinely reviewing the latest medical data available?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, we are committed to routinely reviewing the latest medical data available. As you may be aware, TRICARE completed the most recent review on June 28, 2013. However, TRICARE has deferred a final decision pending reassessment based on experience under the ABA Pilot and any other pertinent new information. During this interim period, TMA will continue ABA coverage under the Basic Program per existing policy as well as continue periodic reviews as new data and evidence become available.

MENTAL HEALTH

18. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright, the last issue we discussed was the issue of mental health, including the stigma surrounding post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), as well as the rates of suicide in our Services. I receive the monthly suicide data and am saddened to see the number of servicemembers who fall through the cracks in the system. If confirmed, what are your plans to improve upon suicide prevention throughout DOD?

Ms. WRIGHT. At every level of leadership, DOD recognizes the complex nature of suicide and the widespread outreach effort that is needed to tackle this problem. My plan to improve suicide prevention across the Department has already begun on several fronts. First, we are working closely with the Department of Veterans Affairs on a standard and consistent message for the Military Crisis Line, which is available in the United States, Europe, Korea and Afghanistan. I plan on adding Japan.

We have adopted a peer support model through Vets4Warriors that offers case management, referrals, and support to all who need it. We have provided a multitude of training and educational events worldwide to prevent suicide and build resilience among our military and civilian workforce and to involve their families. I intend to continue our support for these events and will ensure that the Defense Suicide Prevention Office (DSPO) is fully engaged in providing materials and resources. Suicide prevention research is a priority and efforts to better understand the nature of military suicide risk factors and interventions are underway. Finally, I am committed to working with the Services to ensure that access to care is available for all who seek it, regardless of where they are located.

19. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright, I am also concerned about the reports of suicide among military dependents. What is DOD doing to prevent these suicides?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department is equally concerned and extremely saddened by these reports. We are moving quickly with our outreach efforts to increase awareness and ensure that the right resources and programs are brought to bear at the right time to address the challenges of our families. Our military families have done all that has been asked of them, serving honorably and faithfully in support of their servicemember. Now it is part of the Department's solemn commitment to them that we do everything in our power to reach out and help those family members.

The provisions of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2014 section on Suicide and Military Families helped focus the efforts of the Defense Suicide Prevention Office (DSPO) to determine the prevalence of and prevention strategies for military family member suicides. DSPO facilitates a working group of subject matter experts charged with developing a deliberate and comprehensive strategy for measuring the prevalence and incidence of suicides among military dependents. DSPO has identified several surveillance options that would give us a clearer understanding of the risk factors involved and is continuing to work with the Defense Manpower Data Center and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) to also examine a possible relationship between military dependent and servicemember suicides. This critical work will inform what the suicide prevention needs of our military families are to better align programs and resources to help those in need. The results of these efforts and a plan to assess suicide among military families and its impact on servicemembers will be presented in a report to Congress due by April 1, 2014.

In addition to providing a full spectrum of resources available to help military families with the stressors they face before they face a crisis, DOD is directing both servicemembers and families to the "Supporting Military Families in Crisis" guide which provides family members with information on suicide warning signs and risk factors, actions to take when a family member is in crisis, and available resources to promote a healthy lifestyle and build a resilient family. The guide is available online at www.suicideoutreach.org.

20. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright, what resources are needed to improve suicide prevention among military dependents?

Ms. WRIGHT. DOD is committed to providing and promoting a wide range of programs and services that enhance Service and family member resilience which help eliminate or manage many of the stressors that can contribute to crisis behaviors including suicidal ideation. This multidisciplinary approach includes Morale, Welfare, and Recreation (MWR) programs that alleviate stress; financial readiness counseling, child care solutions, relationship management and spouse employment initiatives; as well as suicide prevention support, crisis counseling, and direct intervention programs to rescue and restore families in crisis. We are currently assessing these programs to determine what additional efforts are required to provide the most effective suite of resources to our servicemembers and their families. We will continue to inform and work with Congress if we need additional resources or authorities to better support our servicemembers and dependents.

21. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright, just this week General Dempsey said, "Men and women should have the opportunity to overcome their mental disorders or their mental health challenges and shouldn't be stigmatized. A man or woman should have the ability with treatment to overcome their challenges and then to have a fruitful life and gain employment, including inside the military." What is being done to ensure our servicemembers are getting the appropriate screening for PTSD and the appropriate follow-up care?

Ms. WRIGHT. DOD enacted a deployment mental health assessment process that requires comprehensive person-to-person mental health assessments at four time points: (a) within 120 days of deployment; (b) between 90 and 180 days after return from deployment; (c) between 180 days and 18 months after return from deployment; and (d) between 18–30 months after return from deployment. These assessments comply with requirements in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012, section 702, and NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, section 703, and are performed either by licensed mental health professionals or by designated individuals trained and certified to perform the assessments. To date, more than 9,000 providers have been trained and certified to administer deployment mental health assessments.

The deployment mental health assessments include an analysis of self-reported responses to mental health questions on symptoms of depression, PTSD, and alcohol misuse; detailed follow-up on positive responses to previous mental health diagnoses and medication use; and exploration of other reported emotional, life stress, and mental health concerns. During a confidential dialog with the servicemember, the provider conducts an assessment of the risk for suicide or violence, offers education on relevant mental health topics, administers brief interventions, and makes recommendations for follow-up assessment and care, when indicated. Servicemembers who are identified as needing additional assessment or treatment for PTSD are referred for appropriate follow-up care at a military medical treatment facility, Veterans Affairs Medical Center or Vet Center, through the TRICARE Purchased Care Network, or in the community, depending on the servicemember's duty status and personal preference.

In addition to these pre- and post-deployment mental health assessments, symptoms of PTSD, depression, alcohol abuse, and other mental health concerns are routinely assessed during annual health assessments and during regular medical appointments with primary care providers. DOD has increased mental health staffing by 35 percent over the last 3 years, and has embedded mental health providers within primary care clinics to increase access to care and support early identification of PTSD and other mental health concerns.

CYBER

22. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright and Ms. James, the cyber field is a fast-paced, ever-changing arena. If confirmed, what steps will you take to ensure we are recruiting the best and the brightest to this field?

Ms. WRIGHT. The growth, sustainment, and long-term career progression of a talented cyberspace workforce is critical to defend the Nation in this domain. If confirmed, I will continue to support ongoing initiatives for identifying and recruiting personnel with the appropriate cyberspace talents. I will also review current recruiting and retention challenges and explore options for meeting these challenges. My focus will include both military and civilian workforce concerns.

23. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright and Ms. James, what authorities will be needed to keep the U.S. military on the cutting edge of cyber?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department is currently reviewing the authorities required to maintain superiority in this domain.

If confirmed, I will explore human capital or specialty shortfalls in the cyberspace defense career fields and, where needed, pursue recruiting and retention authorities which allow the Department to ensure we are recruiting and keeping the best and brightest in this field.

DOD–VA RECORDS TRANSFER

24. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright, in your advance policy questions you were asked several questions about how DOD is coordinating with the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) on records transfers. I am grateful for your strong commitment to this issue, and would like to continue to work with you to ensure our transitioning servicemembers do not fall through the cracks. While I understand that each side has issues to work through in coordinating with the other, what more can DOD do to ensure our veterans have a smooth transition from DOD to the VA?

Ms. WRIGHT. The most important thing DOD can do to assist VA is to ensure the information needed to reduce disability claims processing times is available in a timely and accurate manner. We have done everything VA has asked us to, and we continue to meet regularly with them to seek ways to further refine information exchange processes. We have a number of key information sharing enablers, which include the electronic health record and the Health Artifact and Image Management Solution, and the paperless DD Form 214 initiative, that are being developed for both personnel and medical record data. As these enablers become available, we will continue to collaborate with VA to refine processes to realize the full potential of these initiatives.

We work closely with VA to ensure servicemembers understand the benefits for which they are eligible and how to apply for and access those benefits. We have recently implemented a new Transition Assistance Program and VA is a key part of that curriculum. We continue to register new recruits and transitioning servicemembers for DOD Self-Service (DS) Logon Accounts that allow access to the VA eBenefits portal.

We anticipate that these enhancements to data exchange and greater servicemember access to the benefits for which they are eligible will be smooth and make their transition from the military a seamless experience. If confirmed, I will continue to monitor these efforts as one of my priorities.

25. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright, is there a need for increased resources?

Ms. WRIGHT. No, not at the current time. However, we will continue to inform and work with Congress if we need additional resources or authorities to better support our servicemembers and dependents.

INTEGRATED ELECTRONIC HEALTH RECORDS

26. Senator GILLIBRAND. Secretary Wright, I would also like an update on where plans stand for an integrated electronic health records system. I know that earlier plans for a shared system were scrapped in favor of finding a way to link the existing systems at DOD and the VA. Has there been progress in this new plan?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes. Under the leadership of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics, we have established both a program office and appointed a full-time, dedicated Program Executive Officer to ensure timely and efficient execution of our Integrated Electronic Healthcare Records (IEHR) near-term efforts and our Defense Healthcare Management System Modernization (DHMSM) program. In addition to continuing the near-term IEHR efforts, we are aggressively working on the DHMSM acquisition and contracting strategy with a goal of releasing an initial draft of the Request For Proposal by the end of this calendar year.

The Department is committed to the seamless transfer of electronic health care data between DOD and VA. Continuity of care is a key component of quality health care, and interoperability between DOD and VA's electronic health record data is essential to enabling this continuity. Achieving health record data interoperability and exchange is possible regardless of the software systems used by DOD and VA. A critical near-term effort we are undertaking is the data interoperability "accelerators" initiative. The first increment of these "accelerators" is on track to complete by December 2013, so providers have improved access to data. Near-term progress includes:

- In partnership with the VA, we identified the national standards-based data formats and initiated the DOD and VA data mapping required to standardize patient data for seven of the highest priority data domains.
- DOD and VA have agreed to use a common Health Data Dictionary as a mechanism to translate current DOD and VA medical information into national standards. This will further increase our data sharing and interoperability moving forward.
- We have completed the deployment of the Janus Joint Viewer to nine sites, including the five VA Polytrauma and Rehabilitation Centers and two Level-5 Military Treatment Centers, and expanded the use of the Joint Viewer at two additional sites. This viewer provides clinicians with easier access to healthcare data from all the sites where the patient has been treated in the DOD or VA.

Modernizing both Departments' legacy clinical information systems is the next step in providing seamless interoperability. VA is planning to modernize its VistA system and use it as the basis of its future health care management system core software. There are logical business reasons for VA's decision to stay with VistA: VA has a large installed VistA base, a large in-house staff that maintains and programs software for VistA, and a workforce that is experienced and trained to manage the system. DOD is not in the same position and has operational requirements that differ from those of the VA. Under the restructured DHMSM program, DOD will pursue a competitive process to select its core from the vibrant EHR marketplace to deliver a best-value solution. DOD will leverage national standards and open architecture design principles to preserve flexibility, and help foster a thriving, competitive marketplace. It is worth noting that our recent market analysis has identified some VistA-based offerings from multiple companies. These offerings are technically mature EHR solutions, and we will like see proposals from them for DOD consideration.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MAZIE K. HIRONO

RECRUITING AND RETENTION

27. Senator HIRONO. Secretary Wright, what are the impacts of sequestration on recruitment and retention for the uniformed military?

Ms. WRIGHT. Recruiting and retaining the All-Volunteer Force requires the commitment to adequately resource our efforts. Sequestration has created a level of budget uncertainty that makes this much more challenging. The improving economy will provide potential recruits and members currently serving in the military greater opportunities to work or serve outside the military. This, compounded by reduced discretionary funds for enlistment and retention bonuses, will make attracting and retaining the highest quality force more challenging.

Furthermore, the negative impact of sequestration on operations and training may discourage the best and brightest from joining the military and discourage retention of our most talented service men and women. Any negative impacts to recruitment and retention will impact the ability of our servicemembers to execute our national security strategy, which is hinged upon being the most technologically advanced, best equipped, and most highly trained force in the world.

IMPACTS OF FURLOUGH

28. Senator HIRONO. Secretary Wright, for our valued civil servants in DOD, the furloughs have created difficult situations for many. What are the impacts on recruitment and retention of our civil service employees?

Ms. WRIGHT. Although the full effects may take time to materialize, but we know sequestration has negatively impacted the morale of our civilian workforce and caused significant stress for them and their families. We also expect that the continued budget uncertainties the Department faces will inhibit our ability refresh the workforce and may cause our most experienced workers to consider leaving the Department. The impact on recruitment and retention will affect readiness across the Department. The Department hopes that Congress will enact a balanced deficit reduction plan that the President can sign that eliminates sequestration and the resulting impact to our civilian workforce.

COMMAND CLIMATE

29. Senator HIRONO. Secretary Wright, a command climate survey can go a long way in determining how effective a unit is and whether or not negative actions such as sexual harassment are tolerated and/or reported. What is your opinion of the current climate surveys?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Defense Equal Opportunity Climate Survey (DEOCS) is designed specifically for the purpose of assessing organizational climate and works exceedingly well. The survey can be administered in different ways (on-line or paper/pencil) and the results are produced in minimum time. The DEOCS has evolved over several years and was developed by the Defense Equal Opportunity Management Institute in coordination with the Defense Manpower Data Center.

The DEOCS is well-validated and continues to evolve to address current human relations issues. It is currently the survey instrument of choice by the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Air Force, which has used its own unit climate assessment instrument in the past, plans to begin using DEOCS in the near future.

30. Senator HIRONO. Secretary Wright, should climate surveys be kept to monitor potential long-term issues?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department currently maintains historical survey data which help us identify potential long-term issues and provide organizational-wide insight into the effectiveness of leadership actions. We would expect climate survey to be used in the same manner by component leadership.

31. Senator HIRONO. Secretary Wright, should climate surveys be tied to the commander's permanent personnel records so as to monitor performance as a leader? What about other assessments such as 360 evaluations?

Ms. WRIGHT. I do not believe it is necessary to include climate survey results or assessments in an officer's permanent record. With the recent Secretary of Defense mandate requiring that annual command climate survey results be provided to the next level up in the chain of command we will be better postured to assess unit climate. Additionally, there are other measures in evaluation and performance reports that give us a clear understanding of individual's leadership capability and potential. For example, an officer's overall annual performance evaluations which are tied to effectiveness with regard to meeting organization objectives and goals.

Currently used by some DOD organizations, 360 evaluations also provide a comprehensive feedback of overall management style and assess broad competencies such as teamwork, leadership skills, and communication effectives; however are used primarily for assessing future professional development and are not generally included in permanent personnel records.

COMMISSARY BENEFIT

32. Senator HIRONO. Secretary Wright, what is your assessment of the current state of the Defense Commissary System?

Ms. WRIGHT. The commissary continues to be one of the most popular non-pay compensation benefits enjoyed by military members and their families. As an integral element of the total compensation package, commissaries enhance quality of life for military families and provide an excellent return on investment. Last fiscal year, the commissary provided direct savings to customers of over $2.8 billion for a taxpayer cost of $1.4 billion.

However, between the Department-wide hiring freeze and employee furloughs, commissary customer service has suffered. With the high turnover rate of lower-graded employees in commissaries, the hiring freeze quickly reduced the manning in 69 percent of stores below the 90 percent level. Over a dozen stores fell below 75 percent manning; and two were manned at 60 percent or lower. The recent sequestration-driven furlough, which led to the closing of most stores for 1 day a week for 6 weeks, further impacted customers. Customer complaints rose by over 50 percent and hit an all-time high during the furlough. Excellent commissary customer service suffered as customers found long check-out lines, empty shelves, and employees dealing with their own personal economic challenges due to a 20 percent pay reduction. That reduction was particularly hard on store-level employees, many of whom are part-time employees.

33. Senator HIRONO. Secretary Wright, what is the benefit as a value in terms of recruiting and retention?

Ms. WRIGHT. A number of surveys have concluded that commissaries rate highly among quality of life factors contributing to retention in the military. A GAO survey found that commissaries ranked #2 by enlisted personnel and #3 by officers as a reason to stay in the military. In our 2009 Status of Forces Survey, 90 percent of Active Duty personnel report they use the commissary, and 81 percent of those who use the commissary shop monthly or more frequently. Our surveys also show a majority of Active Duty members believe the commissary offers better safety and security than other stores in the community.

The commissary gives military personnel peace of mind, particularly when we place them in harm's way, knowing that their families have the support they need in a safe and secure shopping environment. Also, the commissary employs a large number of military dependents and provides a sense of community. Military personnel appreciate that commissary managers and employees understand the challenges and sometimes difficult life borne by military families. Therefore, I believe that this benefit has a great value to our servicemembers and their families.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

SEXUAL ASSAULT SURVEY

34. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, if confirmed, will you commit to directing that an independent survey be conducted on sexual assault in the military, using an experienced outside organization that specializes in surveys, to design, conduct, and analyze survey results, with a goal of establishing clear, objective data and metrics that can be used to measure progress on eliminating sexual assault in the military?

Ms. WRIGHT. If confirmed, I agree to look at this issue. I am firmly committed to improving the Department's efforts to prevent and respond to sexual assaults in the military. If confirmed, I will look at how the Department conducts its sexual assault survey, to include the methodology used.

HOLLOW FORCE

35. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, are you concerned about the reemergence of a hollow force?

Ms. WRIGHT. The potential for hollowing of the force is always a concern in times of fiscal constraint and drawdown. Readiness degradations driven by manpower, equipment and training shortfalls are of prime importance to us and we work constantly with the Joint Staff and Services to monitor trends and indicators related to potential hollowing. "Hollowness" in the 1970s and 1990s was driven primarily by excess force structure, recruiting/retention shortfall, increased optempo, and underfunded training accounts. If confirmed, I intend to monitor these potential problems closely to ensure we do not hollow our great force.

36. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, as the President's nominee what guidance or instruction, if any, were you provided on how to address the onset of a hollow force?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Secretary of Defense made readiness an imperative as we began planning for lower budgets and reduced endstrength nearly 3 years ago. Since then, the imperative to monitor, manage, and protect both near- and long-term readiness remains strong. If confirmed, I will be responsible for providing the Secretary and Deputy Secretary a regular accounting of our current readiness status, the associated risks, and options for mitigating that risk. In executing this responsibility, I would be required to focus not only the status and risks of the units, but also the status and the risks associated with the pipelines that support our ability to properly man, train, and equip our forces. Historically, it has been problems in these pipelines that create the most durable readiness degradations.

37. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, if confirmed, what measures would you use to identify the extent of a hollow force for the Secretary of Defense?

Ms. WRIGHT. In order to preserve the health and viability of our All-Volunteer Force, we must ensure that our readiness, force structure and modernization remain balanced. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Services to ensure their force management plans fully optimize both short-term readiness and long-term modernization/procurement efforts as they implement force structure reductions.

Additionally, we must give particular attention to protecting the Services' pipeline processes that are critical to generating warfighting capabilities. Metrics gauging the health of these pipelines are the most valuable readiness/hollowness metrics because they cover the breadth of man/train/equip concerns and typically provide our best forecasts. Manpower metrics include measures of individual training, recruit quality, experience, and manning levels for critical occupations. Equipment metrics include availability rates, failure rates, repair rates, spares fill, unit fill, and depot throughput. Training metrics include individual and unit proficiency, graduate-level (collective training) unit/individual training accomplishment, and even range viability metrics.

CIVILIAN WORKFORCE

38. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, how will DOD manage the civilian workforce in the next fiscal year under sequestration?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department must continue to effectively manage our civilian workforce to ensure we maintain the appropriate mix of skill sets, and related experience, to maintain the readiness of our military. Our goal is to shape the workforce in a manner that minimizes adversity to our valued and talented civilian workforce. The Department hopes that Congress will enact a balanced deficit reduction plan that the President can sign which eliminates sequestration.

39. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, what workforce management tools may DOD use if faced with another year of a sequestered budget—more furloughs, reductions in force, or early retirements?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department must continue to effectively manage our civilian workforce to ensure we maintain the appropriate mix of skill sets, and related experience, to maintain the readiness of our military. Our goal is to shape the workforce in a manner that minimizes adversity to our valued and talented civilian workforce.

The Department is currently operating under hiring restrictions and will continue to do so under sequestration. Workforce management tools such as Voluntary Separation Incentive Pay and Voluntary Early Retirement Authority, have been authorized and encouraged, both of which are valuable in reducing involuntary separations and associated costs.

The Department hopes that Congress will enact a balanced deficit reduction plan that the President can sign which eliminates sequestration.

40. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, will DOD consider exempting working capital fund employees from furloughs if it still faces a sequestered budget in fiscal year 2014?

Ms. WRIGHT. At the present time there is no plan to administratively furlough DOD employees in fiscal 2014. The Department hopes that Congress will enact a balanced deficit reduction plan that the President can sign which eliminates sequestration.

41. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, pay freezes and furloughs may cause young people not to consider a career in DOD. What tools can DOD use to incentivize young professionals to choose a career of service in DOD?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department continues to use available recruiting methods and programs, such as Pathways, to attract young professionals. In addition, the Department continues to offer the Student Loan Repayment Program, Training and Professional Development opportunities, and many other benefits that promote a healthy work life balance.

42. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, does DOD need additional recruiting authorities to compete for top young talent in the current job market?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department has adequate authorities in place to assist us with competing for top young talent in the current job market. However, the time it takes to hire Federal employees as well as hiring restrictions under which the Department is currently operating, impact our ability to compete for top talent. The Department is continuously reviewing our authorities and programs so that we remain an employer of choice among young professionals.

43. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, we have received reports of medical professionals leaving DOD because they are fed up with pay freezes and furloughs. We also hear that DOD doctors and nurses have chosen to leave DOD to work for the VA. If confirmed, will you advocate for exemption of civilian medical professionals from furloughs if DOD faces another year under sequestration?

Ms. WRIGHT. During the past furlough period, I asked my staff to carefully monitor Medical Treatment Facility operations and advise me if they saw any evidence that we were experiencing challenges in meeting our health care obligation to our beneficiary population, including Wounded Warriors. After the first few furlough days, a need to request additional furlough exceptions began to take shape. At the same time, due to a combination of Congressional approvals and Departmental budget management efforts, we were able to reduce furlough for most DOD civilians from 11 days (88 hours) to 6 days (48 hours). Our civilian medical professionals are back to their pre-furlough schedules providing all of the critical services.

We are still assessing the extent of damage caused by sequestration and the associated furloughs and, while no decisions have been made about the need for future furloughs or exceptions at this time, I will continue to be vigilant in maintaining our health care obligations and apply the lessons learned from the past furlough experience. I am committed to our patients and our staff and seek to minimize their inconvenience and maintain an exceptional "care experience" and "work experience" for both groups. This commitment will remain the Department's core theme as we address financial challenges in the future.

44. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, in your opinion, does DOD need additional pay authorities to better compete with the VA civilian medical professionals?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department does not need additional pay authorities to better compete with the VA civilian medical professionals. DOD has the authority of section 1599c of title 10, and DOD and the Office of Personnel Management have a July 31, 2006, Delegation Agreement authorizing the use of title 38 (VA) pay tables for DOD civilian health professionals.

RELIGIOUS EXPRESSION

45. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, in your answer to the advance policy questions, you responded that "[s]ervicemembers are entitled to have personal views and to express them in personal conversations; however, servicemembers are not entitled to use their official capacity as a forum to express their personal views. Servicemembers who express personal views when speaking in an official capacity may be held accountable for what they say." Is it your understanding of DOD policy that sincerely held beliefs cannot be expressed if they differ from DOD policy?

Ms. WRIGHT. Expressions of sincerely held religious beliefs in personal conversations are permissible and considered as protected religious speech until such expressions disrupt the mission, have an adverse impact on good order and discipline, have the appearance of coercion, or can reasonably be regarded as suggesting DOD endorsement of religion.

SAME SEX BENEFITS

46. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, you stated in your confirmation hearing that the September 4 same-sex policy memorandum would only apply to opposite-sex couples in very rare cases. What important military interest is advanced by a policy that benefits same-sex couples but not opposite-sex couples?

Ms. WRIGHT. The September 4 memorandum on the policy clarification, which applies to same-sex couples and opposite-sex couples, allows administrative time off for individuals who cannot get legally married within 100 miles of where they are assigned. As I acknowledged during my confirmation hearing, there may well be a few occasions where an opposite-sex couple would run up against this issue, but that does not invalidate my belief that the policy is fair and equitable to all.

We have bases and installations in all 50 States and around the globe. However, many servicemembers are assigned in remote or isolated locations, and we learned that not all local laws are equal when it comes to marriage-regardless of sexual orientation. While this policy may apply in fewer situations for opposite sex couples than it might for same sex couples, it facilitates travel for any disadvantaged servicemember seeking a legal marriage, when local laws or policies prevent that member from obtaining a legal marriage locally.

PAY

47. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, what would be the impact on readiness if Congress authorizes a 1.8 percent pay increase instead of the 1 percent requested by the administration?

Ms. WRIGHT. The 1 percent basic pay raise requested in the President's budget recognizes the sacrifices by the men and women in our Armed Forces, while adhering to the current budget constraints faced by DOD. This pay raise proposal was a tough decision reached by the senior leaders of the Department (including the uniformed military leadership) after carefully weighing other options for saving the $0.6 billion in fiscal year 2014 and nearly $3.5 billion through fiscal year 2018 generated by this 0.8 percent pay raise adjustment. If Congress authorized the full 1.8 percent military basic pay increase, the Department would have to impose deeper reduction to troop levels as well as to readiness and modernization accounts for training or equipping our forces.

48. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, what would you do, if confirmed, to mitigate the impact of a 1.8 percent pay increase for military personnel and a 1 percent increase for civilian personnel, on overall military readiness?

Ms. WRIGHT. The administration requested a 1.0 percent basic pay increase for military personnel. Because military compensation today compares favorably with compensation in the private sector, the Department does not believe the additional 0.8 percent military basic pay increase is necessary to sustain recruiting and retention. If Congress were to authorize an additional 0.8 percent increase in basic pay for military personnel, it would cost an additional $580 million in fiscal year 2014 (including $40.0 million for Contingency Operations funding) and nearly $3.5 billion through fiscal year 2018. As these costs are not offset, the Department would be forced to pay for this additional military pay increase by reducing military end strength beyond the drawdown already planned and further cutting funds for training and equipping our forces. At a time when statutory spending caps require defense reductions, there is no viable means to mitigate these readiness impacts if the higher pay raise is enacted.

In regards to a 1.0 percent increase for civilian personnel, the administration included this increase in its budget for fiscal year 2014, the Department does not believe it will adversely affect military readiness, thus mitigation will not be necessary. However, if confirmed I will work with my staff to ensure any impacts to overall military readiness are mitigated.

FAMILY SUPPORT PROGRAMS AND SERVICES

49. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, what impact has sequestration had on: (1) child development center programs; (2) child and youth programs; (3) commissary and exchange services; (4) recreation programs; and (5) civilian spouse employment programs?

Ms. WRIGHT. (1) (2) Child development center programs at the installation level were excepted from civilian furloughs and child and youth programs continued to operate with no change in service. The Military Services reduced the weekly cost of care for families affected by the furlough. Child and youth recreation programs saw little to no effect since these programs are primarily funded through Non-appropriated Funds (NAF).

(3) Sequestration had a direct impact on our commissary patrons and employees. With the Department-wide hiring freeze and employee furloughs, commissary customers often found long checkout lines, closed registers, and empty shelves. The closure of most stores for 1 day a week for 6 weeks because of the furloughs impacted customers further. Customer complaints rose by over 50 percent and hit an all-time high during the furlough. While Defense Commissary Agency employees struggled to continue their previously excellent customer service, they could not always overcome the challenges. The impact of sequestration on the exchange services has been minor because they operate as nonappropriated funded activities and receive little appropriated fund support.

(4) Sequestration has caused sustained reductions to recreation programs (MWR) that negatively impact future readiness, resilience, and retention. The Military Services indicate they are energetically working to identify economies and efficiencies to minimize the fiscal uncertainty created by sequestration driven funding cuts, and are focusing the limited appropriated fund dollars available on their most essential programs and services. However, we are seeing reductions to hours of operation and staff, increased user fees, and consolidation of similar facilities and programs. Installation MWR programs are also collaborating with local communities, schools, and business entities to maximize the availability of programs and services, and many are evaluating low usage programs for potential elimination.

(5) Spouse employment programs at military installations were not able to provide full career and education services due to a shortage of personnel and reduced operating hours resulting from civilian furloughs and hiring freezes. Services for military spouses provided by the Spouse Education and Career Opportunities Program were generally not impacted by civilian furloughs because it is under an already funded contract.

50. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, how will family support programs and services be affected if sequestration continues in the future?

Ms. WRIGHT. We have seen the impacts of sequestration across all programs through reduced levels of service, hours, and higher prices directly impacting our servicemembers and their families. We will strive to protect family programs; however, the continuation of sequestration will limit our ability to maintain the current levels of family support and to respond to new requirements resulting from continued deployments and the downsizing of forces. Programs that promote well-being and enhance readiness are often provided by civilian employees who are especially vulnerable to hiring freezes, furloughs, and reduced funding.

A symbiotic relationship exists between the commissaries, exchanges, and MWR programs that comprise the complex interdependent military resale system. MWR programs depend on the dividends generated through the exchange services. Appropriated fund reductions in any area would have negative impacts on the entire military resale system jeopardizing the availability, quality, and savings of these to the military servicemembers and their families.

We continue to review more efficient and cost effective ways of doing business while providing the programs and services valued by our servicemembers and their families. No one wants to negatively impact the lives of servicemembers and their families; however, the fiscal realities of sequestration are forcing the Department and the Military Services to make some very tough decisions.

MILITARY HEALTH SYSTEMS

51. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, earlier this year, DOD issued a Resource Management Decision directing the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs to conduct a comprehensive review of Military Health System's (MHS) capabilities and requirements. Recently, the Navy advised the committee that it plans to realign eight medical treatment facilities to enhance efficiency, improve quality of care, and enhance provider training opportunities. When will this committee receive a briefing on the outcome of the comprehensive review of MHS capabilities and requirements?

Ms. WRIGHT. The review of the MHS's capabilities and requirements is ongoing and the results will feed into the fiscal year 2015 Program Review. The results of this review of capabilities and requirements will be available during the rollout of the fiscal year 2015 President's budget. We look forward to briefing the committee of the review outcome after the submission of the fiscal year 2015 President's budget.

52. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, was the Navy's decision to realign facilities a result of this review?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Navy's assessment of their facilities was completed prior to the start of the MHS's capabilities and requirements review. Their results were included as a part of the review's deliberations. The Navy, along with the Army and Air Force, continuously evaluate the match between beneficiary demand and medical capabilities. Our assessments and results will be included in the fiscal year 2015 President's budget.

53. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, how has this review impacted the medical facilities of the Army and Air Force?

Ms. WRIGHT. The assessment is still ongoing and the final results will be included in the fiscal year 2015 President's budget.

54. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, will any Army or Air Force medical facilities be realigned in the future?

Ms. WRIGHT. The assessment is ongoing and the final results will be included in the fiscal year 2015 President's budget.

INTEGRATED DISABILITY EVALUATION SYSTEM

55. Senator INHOFE. Secretary Wright, in your opinion, what can DOD and the VA can do to further reduce disability claims processing times?

Ms. WRIGHT. The most important thing DOD can do to assist VA is to ensure the information needed to reduce disability claims processing times is available in a timely and accurate manner. In order to meet this goal we will actively pursue a long-term vision of a paperless record keeping environment. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the VA to refine processes to take full advantage of information sharing we are putting in place.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SAXBY CHAMBLISS

LIVING QUARTERS ALLOWANCE

56. Senator CHAMBLISS. Secretary Wright, my staff is working with several Georgia constituents who are DOD civilians affected by a January 2013 DOD audit which determined they were no longer eligible to receive a LQA. The audit determined that, through no fault of their own, 659 DOD civilians in Europe "erroneously" received this incentive pay and that DOD would attempt to recover the overpayments, in many cases in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. Most of these civilians accepted their Federal positions with an understanding that LQA, and other associated benefits, were a term or condition of employment—they would not have accepted the job otherwise. Moreover, this incentive pay was certified, and often certified multiple times, by HR personnel who are intimately familiar with governing regulations and policies.

As you can imagine, this determination is having significant impact on the affected employees and their families. While I appreciate DOD efforts to mitigate the impact—an expedited process to waive the debt, exceptions to the hiring freeze under the PPP, and a 1 year extension of LQA through May 2014—the worst case scenario would find us in June 2014 with a sizable number of affected civilian employees still at the current duty station, unable to find suitable employment elsewhere due to hiring restrictions, responsible for moving their families and personal property at their own expense, and living under the shadow of repaying a large debt. In my opinion, this is not how we should treat our civilian employees, in particular on the heels of the fiscal year 2013 DOD civilian furlough.

If confirmed, will you make it a personal priority to ensure that the affected employees are extended every possible opportunity to secure follow-on employment with return travel and transportation agreements covered under Joint Federal Travel Regulations?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, if I am confirmed this will continue to be a high priority of mine and has the full attention of my office. So far, the waiver process is proving successful in alleviating debt for employees who file requests for relief of the debt. Additionally, we have offered a temporary exception to the PPP to facilitate return placements. Return travel and transportation may still be provided to employees meeting the return transportation conditions upon hiring or, alternately, though management-directed reassignment or PPP placement.

57. Senator CHAMBLISS. Secretary Wright, ultimately the error for this overpayment falls on DOD—either through an incorrect policy determination or by the officials who incorrectly certified LQA eligibility. How did this happen and who is being held accountable?

Ms. WRIGHT. This situation occurred through process errors made at a local DOD component servicing human resources offices. We are in the process of addressing the matter. Looking forward, we want to ensure that our LQA regulations are clear. To that end, by the end of this year, my staff will complete a comprehensive review of the Department's overseas benefits and allowances regulation. Further, the DOD components with the responsibility to train servicing human resources specialists on making benefits and pay determinations must ensure they are doing so correctly through audits or similar oversight means.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

NATIONAL GUARD YOUTH CHALLENGE PROGRAM

58. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, what is your plan to provide standardized, national training for the frontline staff of the National Guard Youth Challenge Program (NGYCP) in fiscal year 2014?

Ms. WRIGHT. I understand the importance of frontline staff training; therefore, if I am confirmed, the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs will continue to work with the Office of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau and the State Adjutant Generals to identify ways to provide standardized training to the NGYCP staff in an efficient and cost-effective manner. During these difficult budgetary times and uncertainty, the Department's first priority is to try to fully support funding of the NGYCP at the maximum DOD cost share of 75 percent to ensure continued operations and cadet development. This work will involve reviewing all current methods implemented by the National Guard Bureau for delivering NGYCP staff training, including existing training programs funded by DOD and other Federal, State, and local agencies that may be provided to NGYCP staff. Once requirements are validated, we will be able to determine best method, schedule, and provider.

59. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, for years, mental health training was provided to National Guard Youth mentors but now that is no longer the case. Will you examine the possibility of restoring mental health training for National Guard Youth Challenge mentors?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, as part of our fiscal year 2014 review of the standardized training for the NGYCP, we will work with the Office of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau and the State Adjutant Generals to examine the possibility of restoring mental health training for mentors participating in the NGYCP.

SEQUESTRATION AND ITS IMPACT ON READINESS

60. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, General Welsh has recently said that under sequestration, the Air Force would be unable to execute the 2012 Strategic Planning Guidance that requires the military to fight one major adversary and deter another. General Welsh also told airmen stationed in Japan that the Air Force would "not be as ready as we would like" if ordered to take action against the Syrian regime. Do you agree with General Welsh's assessments?

Ms. WRIGHT. I agree with General Welsh's assessments regarding the Air Force's ability to respond to emerging contingencies. The Air Force entered sequestration at historically low readiness levels. This steady readiness decline resulted from over 20 years of high operational tempo supporting combatant commanders' requirements fighting the "low-end" wars of the last decade, coupled with reduced funding to their readiness accounts. Sequestration made this situation worse by forcing combat units to stand down and the cancellation of exercises and training courses.

61. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, what are your greatest readiness concerns if sequestration goes forward in 2014?

Ms. WRIGHT. My primary concern is the Department's ability to maintain a force that can satisfy both our current operational commitments as well as provide ready forces for contingencies that are critical for responding to an emergent major theater operation. So far, we have gone to great lengths to protect our ability to do current operations; our risk and my main area of concern lies with our ability to surge a ready force.

In keeping with this concern, we know that sequestration has forced the Department to make hard choices between drawing down force structure and paring back modernization programs. Furthermore, reductions in our training and professional development programs will have a long-term detrimental effect on maintaining proficiency and experience within our ranks. These short-term effects will have longer-term implications that will not be easily reversed even with additional resources.

62. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, General William Shelton, Commander of Air Force Space Command, recently said that sequestration threatens to "break every program" in the U.S. military space enterprise. Do you share his concern?

Ms. WRIGHT. I share General Shelton's concerns regarding the effects sequestration may have on numerous Defense programs. The immediate effects of sequestration are beginning to be felt and are impacting programs throughout the Department.

LIVING QUARTERS ALLOWANCE

63. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, DOD has been working with Congress and the employees in U.S. European Command to achieve a workable solution to the LQA issue. I am concerned that the employees' concerns are not being addressed completely. Many of the employees are concerned with future employment opportunities and the cost associated with moving back to the United States. How many employees have been given Priority 3 or 3a status?

Ms. WRIGHT. All employees identified in the audit as receiving LQA erroneously who choose to return Stateside in the absence of LQA have been eligible to register in the PPP since June 27, 2013. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that 71 affected employees have registered in PPP, 4 have accepted job offers, and 1 has declined an offer.

The Department has also authorized a temporary exception to standard PPP clearance requirements that allows DOD components to reassign LQA-affected employees directly to State-side vacancies that would otherwise not be filled due to a hiring freeze. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that nine affected employees have accepted management-directed reassignments under this special exception to PPP.

In addition, an affected employee generally will be eligible for a paid move back to the United States if returned Stateside as a result of a directed reassignment by the employee's DOD component, if placed through the PPP, or if the employee is a retired military member whose final authorization for return travel has not expired.

64. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, how many employees have been given Priority 1 or 2 status?

Ms. WRIGHT. All employees identified in the audit as receiving LQA erroneously have been eligible to register in the PPP since June 27, 2013, as a Priority 3. Priorities 1 and 2 are reserved for employees who are being separated involuntarily, i.e., losing employment completely. As of September 26, 2013 the DOD components have reported that 71 affected employees have registered in the PPP, 4 have accepted job offers, and 1 has declined an offer. This is not the only procedure to facilitate the timely rotation of those affected employees who choose to return Stateside in the absence of LQA. Most notably, the Department has authorized a temporary exception to standard PPP clearance requirements that allows DOD components to reassign employees directly to Stateside vacancies that would otherwise not be filled due to a hiring freeze. As of September 26, 2013, the DOD components have reported that nine affected employees have accepted management-directed reassignments under this special exception to PPP.

65. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, in Thomas v. United States (Sept. 7, 2011), the court ruled that "The Court disregards the other regulations and guidance's implemented pursuant to the DSSR insofar as they conflict with the DSSR. DODI [Department of Defense Instruction], the Army Corps Memorandum, and AER 690–500.592 conflict with the DSSR because they give the agency discretion to disallow a living quarters allowance when the DSSR provisions would otherwise mandate the allowance." Did the Thomas case play a role in how DOD is addressing the LQA issue?

Ms. WRIGHT. No. Thomas v. United States has not played a role in how the Department is addressing the LQA issue. However, we agree with the Thomas opinion that if an employee satisfies all the eligibility requirements for receiving LQA, and if the Department makes a determination that there is a need for LQA, the incentive may be properly paid, as evidenced by those employees properly granted LQA after being recruited from the United States. Eligibility criteria include that which is stated in the DSSR, as well as the criteria established by the DOD in its LQA regulations. In a subsequent opinion to Thomas, the Court noted in Roberts v. United States (April 30, 2012), that the DSSR expressly delegates authority to heads of Federal agencies to implement additional regulations in this area. Under that delegation, the Secretary of Defense issued DOD Instruction 1400.25, volume 1250, which includes LQA eligibility conditions in addition to those in the DSSR. In this situation, affected employees either did not meet the DSSR eligibility requirements, or those established in volume 1250, or both.

66. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, given the Office of Personnel Management Compensation Claim Decision (OPM File No. 12–0020), is DOD concerned about pecuniary liability due to the Thomas ruling?

Ms. WRIGHT. No, as affected employees in this situation either did not meet the DSSR, or those established in DOD Instruction 1400.25, Volume 1250, or both.

67. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, has DOD received any reimbursement claims related to Thomas? If so, how many?

Ms. WRIGHT. To my knowledge, there have been no reimbursement claims received by the Department.

68. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, has DOD estimated potential liability due to the Thomas case? If so, what is the cost estimate?

Ms. WRIGHT. The Department has not estimated potential liability. However, we have estimated that it will cost approximately $23 million to grant temporary LQA eligibility to affected employees for 1 year.

69. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, in Roberts v. United States (April 30, 2012), the Court stated that the LQA-granting authority has been further delegated within DOD, but in addition to having met the DSSR requirements, the DOD agency "must first designate the position as eligible for LQA". Were any of the positions held by the employees, who were deemed to have erroneously received LQA payments, designated as LQA eligible?

Ms. WRIGHT. DOD Instruction 1400.25, volume 1250, delegates authority to the Heads of DOD components to make LQA determinations. Each DOD component may determine in advance of filling an overseas position whether there is a need for LQA, and which is normally based on an ability to fill the position without the incentive. However, employees filling positions deemed appropriate for LQA must meet the eligibility requirements in order to receive the incentive.

70. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, in both the DSSR and DODI 1400.25 there is an allowance for a waiver based upon "unusual circumstances". Was this the basis for the 1-year waiver that you granted to all LQA audit affected employees?

Ms. WRIGHT. Yes, the DSSR provision for waivers based on unusual circumstances was used for authorizing temporary LQA eligibility for affected employees. I believe that 1 year is sufficient time for the employees to make personal decisions concerning their situations, and to be placed in a State-side position, if they so choose. Providing the incentive beyond that time could be viewed as an abuse of discretion with respect to taxpayer dollars being spent on incentives for which employees are otherwise ineligible.

71. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, does the DSSR or the DODI 1400.25 place any time condition or constraints upon this waiver?

Ms. WRIGHT. No. To mitigate the financial effects of loss of LQA, I granted all employees identified in the audit as receiving LQA erroneously temporary eligibility for LQA for up to a 1-year time period to allow them opportunity to plan a future without the incentive. This period was determined to be reasonable under the circumstances. Further, the Department has supported individual employee requests for waivers of the indebtedness as long as there is no evidence of misrepresentation, fraud, or deception on the part of the employee to receive LQA initially; delayed collection of the indebtedness created by the receipt of LQA erroneously (for those employees who choose to request a waiver) until the waiver process is complete; and authorized flexibilities under the PPP to assist employees who choose to return Stateside in the absence of LQA. As of September 26, 2013, 400 waiver requests have been submitted, 112 full waivers have been approved, and no requests have been disapproved.

72. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, is there any legal reason that would stop you from utilizing this waiver in order to solve this issue on a more long-term basis?

Ms. WRIGHT. To mitigate the financial effects of loss of LQA, I granted all employees identified in the audit as receiving LQA erroneously temporary eligibility for LQA for up to a 1 year time period to allow them opportunity to plan a future without the incentive. This period was determined to be reasonable under the circumstances. Further, the Department has supported individual employee requests for waivers of the indebtedness as long as there is no evidence of misrepresentation, fraud, or deception on the part of the employee to receive LQA initially; delayed collection of the indebtedness created by the receipt of LQA erroneously (for those employees who choose to request a waiver) until the waiver process is complete; and authorized flexibilities under the PPP to assist employees who choose to return State-side in the absence of LQA. As of September 26, 2013, 400 waiver requests have been submitted, 112 full waivers have been approved, and no requests have been disapproved.

73. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, U.S.C. title 10, chapter 163, section 2773a, gives DOD the authority to hold processing officials pecuniary liable. DOD Regulation 7000 further states that "The Secretary of Defense may subject a departmental official to pecuniary liability for an improper or incorrect payment made by DOD, if the Secretary determines that such payment resulted from information or services provided" to a certifying official. Has DOD scrutinized the certifying or authorizing officials who made, according to a DOD Inspector General report, $57 million in erroneous payments?

Ms. WRIGHT. The DOD Financial Management Regulations (FMR) 7000.14R, volume 5, chapter 33, section 3309, which states a certifying officer is pecuniarily liable for payments resulting from improper certifications, is not applicable in this situation. A certifying officer as defined in the FMR does not certify the supporting document authorizing the LQA entitlement, and thus is not liable for these erroneous payments.

74. Senator AYOTTE. Secretary Wright, when an individual who received the erroneous payments signs the waiver form, does this waiver also release DOD officials from any liability in association with that payment?

Ms. WRIGHT. No, signing of the waiver form by an individual only affects the individual employee.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MIKE LEE

RELIGION IN THE MILITARY

75. Senator LEE. Secretary Wright, what do you understand to be the difference between evangelizing, which is allowed by DOD, and proselytizing, which is not allowed?

Ms. WRIGHT. DOD has no policy that directly addresses religious evangelizing and proselytizing. Servicemembers may exercise their rights under the First Amendment regarding the free exercise of religion unless doing so adversely affects good order and discipline, or some other aspect of the military mission; even then, the Department seeks a reasonable religious accommodation for the servicemember. In general, servicemembers may share their faith with other servicemembers in unofficial settings, but may not forcibly attempt to convert others to their own beliefs. Concerns that may arise regarding these issues are handled on a case-by-case basis by the leaders of the unit involved, in consultation with Chaplains and legal advisors.

76. Senator LEE. Secretary Wright, how are these differences explained to commanders in the military, and do you believe it is consistently applied?

Ms. WRIGHT. Chaplains from the Military Departments are directly involved in the training of commanders. This training includes discussion and guidelines concerning the balance of freedoms for servicemembers with religious beliefs as well as those with no religious belief. Due to this training, expressions of free speech and religious practice are consistently applied across the Military Departments.

ERRONEOUS LIVING QUARTERS ALLOWANCE

77. Senator LEE. Secretary Wright, the Office of the Secretary of Defense and your office have stated that the erroneous payments to civilian employees living overseas and receiving LQA payments were made "through no fault of the individual". Why did DOD give these payments erroneously and who is being held at fault for the erroneous payments?

Ms. WRIGHT. This situation occurred through errors made by individual employees assigned to a DOD component servicing human resources offices, and we are in the process of addressing the matter. Looking forward, we want to ensure that our LQA regulations are clear. By the end of this year, my staff will complete a comprehensive review of the Department's overseas benefits and allowances regulation. Further, the DOD components with the responsibility to train servicing human resources specialists on making benefits and pay determinations must ensure they are doing so correctly through audits or similar oversight means.

78. Senator LEE. Secretary Wright, when the employee who has received erroneous payments signs the waiver for their debts, does the waiver also release DOD officials from any liability in association with the payment?

Ms. WRIGHT. No, signing of the waiver form by an individual only affects the individual employee.

[Prepared questions submitted to Mr. Frank G. Klotz by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DUTIES AND QUALIFICATIONS

Question. What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualify you to perform the duties of the Under Secretary for Nuclear Security and Administrator of the National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA)?

Answer. I served on Active Duty in the U.S. military for nearly 39 years. The majority of my assignments dealt either with nuclear field operations—including maintenance, security, and safety—or with nuclear policymaking at the national and international levels.

I have also had extensive experience leading large organizations with technically-complex missions and a diverse, highly-skilled workforce. As the first commander of Air Force Global Strike Command, I helped establish and lead a brand new organization that merged responsibility for all U.S. nuclear-capable bombers and missiles under a single chain-of-command. Within the space of only 14 months, we defined the organization's vision and values, recruited 800 highly-talented professionals into a new headquarters, took charge of 5 major installations and 23,000 people; and strengthened accountability at all levels. Earlier in my career, I was second in command of Air Force Space Command when it had responsibility for the Nation's intercontinental ballistic missile force. At that time, AFSPC comprised 39,400-persons charged with responsibility for developing, acquiring and operating a global network of launch, satellite control, communications, and missile warning facilities.

Since retiring from Active Duty, I have worked as a Senior Fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and participated in several "Track 2" conferences and workshops, most notably with the Committee on International Security and Arms Control of the U.S. National Academy of Sciences. These activities have deepened my understanding of the nuclear capabilities and policies of other nations, as well as the dangers posed by nuclear proliferation, regional arms races, and the threat of nuclear terrorism.

All of these experiences bear directly on NNSA's broad mission set, as well as the challenges of leading an organization of its size and scope. I am grateful to President Obama and Secretary Moniz for their trust and confidence in providing me an opportunity to continue to serve and contribute to the critically important tasks of ensuring that our Nation's nuclear arsenal remains safe, secure, and effective, and enhancing nuclear security across the globe.

Question. What changes, if any, do you anticipate in these duties, if you are confirmed for the position?

Answer. I do not anticipate any changes to these duties of Under Secretary for Nuclear Security or NNSA Administrator if I am confirmed.

Question. Do you believe that there are any steps that you need to take to enhance your expertise to perform the duties of the Under Secretary for Nuclear Security?

Answer. Based on my previous operational and policymaking positions within the Nation's nuclear enterprise—including leadership of large, technically complex organizations—I personally believe that I am ready now to assume the duties of Under Secretary for Nuclear Security. However, I have always believed in the need for and value of life-long learning and constantly seeking new, innovative solutions. If confirmed, I will immediately and continuously engage with all elements of the NNSA enterprise—specially the directors of the national security laboratories, plants, headquarters, and field offices—to broaden and deepen my understanding of NNSA's capabilities, requirements, and challenges. I also intend to regularly consult with Members of Congress and their staffs to better understand their concerns and to benefit from their insights on NNSA, its mission, and its issues.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what additional or new duties and functions, if any, do you expect that the Secretary of Energy would prescribe for you other than those described above?

Answer. The Secretary of Energy has not indicated to me that he intends to prescribe any additional or new duties and functions. However, if confirmed, I would serve at the pleasure of the President and Secretary of Energy and in accordance with the laws enacted by Congress, and would obviously perform any additional or new duties and functions they might assign.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. If confirmed, how will you work with the following officials in carrying out your duties:

The Secretary of Energy.

Answer. I share Secretary of Energy Moniz's strong belief in the importance of NNSA's mission and its many contributions to the Nation's security, as well as the urgent need to address program management, cost overruns, and security. If confirmed, I will work with him in a collaborative manner and, as stipulated in the NNSA Act, "subject to the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary."

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Energy.

Answer. If confirmed, I will also work closely with Deputy Secretary Dan Poneman and subject to the "authority, direction and control" delegated by the Secretary to the Deputy Secretary in accordance with the NNSA Act.

Question. The Deputy Administrators of the National Nuclear Security Administration.

Answer. I consider the Deputy Administrators—along with the directors of the national security laboratories, plants, and field offices—as an integral part of NNSA's leadership team. If confirmed, I will work with the Deputy Administrators and Associate Administrators to promote better internal communication and collaboration; clarify lines of authority, responsibility and accountability; eliminate duplication of effort and streamline processes; and, professionally develop the NNSA workforce and recognize its employees for their important contributions to the organization and to the Nation.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (USD(AT&L)).

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to work closely with the USD(AT&L) on a wide range of issues, including sustaining a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent; countering the threat of nuclear terrorism and nuclear proliferation; and, enhancing capabilities to manage nuclear incidents both domestically and abroad. Additionally, I am committed to fostering a renewed sense of trust and partnership between the NNSA and the Department of Defense, both through the effective operation of the Nuclear Weapons Council, as well as open and collaborative interaction by the staffs of both departments. I have worked closely with OSD(AT&L) in the past and have enormous respect for the expertise and professionalism of its leadership and personnel.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Policy (USD(P)).

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the USD(P) in providing technical advice on nuclear weapons systems and capabilities to help inform their recommendations to the Secretary of Defense on issues related to the Nation's current and future nuclear weapons requirements, countering the threat of weapons of mass destruction, and providing assistance and extending deterrence to allies and partner nations. I have worked closely with the USD(P) in the past, including Under Secretary Jim Miller, and have enormous respect for the expertise and professionalism of its leadership and personnel.

Question. The Secretaries of the Navy and the Air Force.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Navy and Air Force. Both are major "customers" of NNSA. In addition to formal interaction though the Nuclear Weapons Council (NWC) and the NWC's Standing and Safety Committee, I will emphasize the importance of maintaining open lines of communications between NNSA headquarters, the national security laboratories, and the plants, on the one hand, and the military services, on the other, to ensure the latter's requirements are fully understood and properly met in NNSA's plans, programs, and operations.

Question. The Commanders of U.S. Strategic Command and U.S. Northern Command.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Commander of U.S. Strategic Command (STRATCOM) and U.S. Northern Command (NORTHCOM) by building upon past associations and understanding of their mission, and promoting collaboration in dealing with current and future requirements.

During the course of my military career, I worked extensively with STRATCOM on several different levels, including as commander of its Task 214 and as commander of a major service component. I also previously worked with NORTHCOM in developing plans for nuclear/radiological incident response and consequence management, and participating in NORTHCOM-led exercises.

In addition to formal interaction with the Vice Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, and STRATCOM though the NWC, I will emphasize the importance of maintaining open lines of communications between the NNSA, the national security laboratories and the plants, on the one hand, and STRATCOM and NORTHCOM, on the other, to ensure the latter's requirements are fully understood and properly met in NNSA's plans, programs, and operations.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict (ASD(SOLIC)).

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to work closely with the ASD(SOLIC) on matters related to joint DOD–NNSA capabilities to counter the threat of nuclear terrorism. Though I have not yet been briefed on the details, I understand that the partnership between the special operations community and NNSA is unique in government, and vital to protecting our national security interests.

Question. The Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Nuclear and Chemical and Biological Defense Programs (ASD(NCB)).

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the ASD(NCB) on key issues on the agenda of the NWC and its Standing and Safety Committee. I have worked closely with ASD(NCB) in several past assignments, including Assistant Secretary Andy Weber, and have enormous respect for the expertise and professionalism of its leadership and personnel.

Question. The Director of the Defense Threat Reduction Agency (DTRA).

Answer. As the implementation arm of the DOD's Cooperative Threat Reduction Program and as a major research and development partner, it will be essential to maintain a close and productive working relationship with the Director of the Defense Threat Reduction Agency. I understand that cooperation between NNSA and DTRA is facilitated through regular program coordination meetings under which a variety of working groups collaborate on specific program development, ranging from joint research to developing the most effective ways to implement border security programs. I have worked closely with DTRA in the past, including its Director Ken Myers and have enormous respect for the expertise and professionalism of DTRA's leadership and personnel.

Question. The Director of National Intelligence and other senior leaders of the Intelligence Community.

Answer. I understand that NNSA has a close and longstanding relationship with the Intelligence Community based on NNSA's unique understanding of nuclear weapon capabilities and the contributions of the national security laboratories to broader national security missions. If confirmed, I will continue and strengthen this relationship.

Question. Officials in the Department of Homeland Security with responsibilities for nuclear homeland security matters.

Answer. I understand that NNSA has a close and longstanding relationship with the Department of Homeland Security based on NNSA's unique understanding of nuclear weapon capabilities and the contributions of the national security laboratories to broader national security missions. If confirmed, I will work closely with DHS officials on nuclear counterterrorism issues, radiological/nuclear incident consequence management, and support to National Operations Center (NOC).

Question. Officials in the Department of State with responsibility for nuclear nonproliferation matters.

Answer. If confirmed, I will coordinate closely with the Department of State on issues related to arms control, nuclear nonproliferation, export controls, securing nuclear and radiological materials worldwide, and border security. I have worked closely with the State Department in the past, including serving as Special Assistant to the Deputy Secretary of State, two assignments to overseas diplomatic posts (U.S. Mission to NATO and U.S. Embassy Moscow), as a consultant to Acting Under Secretary of State Rose Gottemoeller, and currently as a member of the Secretary of State's International Security Advisory Board. I have enormous personal respect for the expertise and professionalism of its leadership and personnel.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges confronting the Under Secretary for Nuclear Security and Administrator of the NNSA?

Answer. The NNSA has a unique responsibility for pursuing two different, but complementary principles that have traditionally guided American nuclear weapons policy. The first is that the United States must continue to lead international efforts to limit and reduce nuclear arsenals, prevent nuclear proliferation and terrorism, and secure nuclear materials across the globe. The second is that appropriately-sized nuclear forces still play an essential role in protecting U.S. and allied security interests, even as the United States seeks to reduce the overall number and role of nuclear weapons in our national security policy. As President Obama and leaders in Congress have repeatedly emphasized, as long as nuclear weapons exist, the United States will maintain a safe, secure, and effective nuclear arsenal.

In discharging this responsibility, NNSA performs enormously important work each and every day. Its successes go largely unheralded. It has made tremendous progress in helping to achieve the President's goal of securing vulnerable nuclear materials around the globe. It is delivering the life-extended W76–1 warhead to the Navy on schedule. It is currently transferring work at the Kansas City plant into a new, modern facility that will greatly improve efficiency—and that was constructed on time and on budget.

That said, escalating costs in several major programs and capital construction projects are cause for serious concern, especially as pressures on government spending continue to mount. Additionally, a widely-publicized security lapse at a key NNSA facility last year raises questions about the overall health of the security and safety culture within the broader enterprise.

Restoring trust in NNSA's ability to deliver on its commitments requires strong leadership focus on managing costs to deliver capability for less expense. It also requires rebuilding partnerships between the headquarters and the field; between Federal employees and the contractor workforce at the laboratories and plants; and between NNSA and Congress and the Department of Defense.

It is critical that all of these issues are addressed while placing a strong priority on improving security and safety across the NNSA enterprise.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. To accomplish those things, NNSA must improve its accountability; performance—including project management, planning and cost estimating processes; improve the way it does business; and invest in the future of its enterprise. The NNSA must meet a host of nuclear security requirements while ensuring the best value for taxpayer dollars and balancing priorities among many unique nuclear security activities.

I expect to draw upon my recent experience as the first commander of Air Force Global Strike Command. In the wake of security incidents and cost overruns, NNSA currently faces a situation similar in many respects to what the Air Force encountered in 2007 when several widely-publicized lapses raised concerns about its stewardship of the nuclear enterprise. When we subsequently established Global Strike Command, our first task was to establish clear lines of authority, responsibility, and accountability. We also placed strong emphasis on strengthening the safety and security culture, while at the same time streamlining processes and eliminating needlessly burdensome, non-value-added activities that stood in the way of our people and their incentive to innovate. Finally, we continually emphasized that everyone in the organization, regardless of job, or rank, or seniority was a valued member of the team and that her or his work was absolutely essential to success. If confirmed, this is the leadership approach I intend to bring to NNSA.

The Military Services often say that people are their most important asset. It's true; and, it applies to NNSA as well. Highly trained, experienced and motivated scientists, engineers, technicians, and security personnel are essential to performing the many highly complex and technically challenging tasks associated with the nuclear security enterprise. If confirmed, I will be guided by the principle of "Mission first, people always." To this end, I will be an unrelenting champion for the professional development and personal welfare of everyone associated with NNSA—including recruiting and mentoring the next generation of leaders and experts.

Question. If confirmed, what management actions and time lines would you establish to address these problems?

Answer. If confirmed, I will place immediate emphasis in working with the Secretary, as well as the directors of the national security laboratories, plants and field offices, to: (1) clarify lines of authority, responsibility, and accountability within the entire NNSA enterprise, and (2) identify steps to streamline business processes and eliminate needlessly burdensome, non-value-added activities that stand in the way of NNSA's people and their incentive to innovate. I will likewise focus with intensity on adopting measures to dramatically improve NNSA's capabilities for cost estimation, program management, and oversight of capital construction projects. I will ensure full attention is being devoted at all levels to ensuring the safety and security of NNSA's people and facilities, particularly in light of the security breach at Y–12 National Security Complex last summer. Finally, I will personally reach out to as many NNSA employees as possible and in as short a time as possible to communicate the continued importance of NNSA's work, to hear their views and concerns, and to thank them for their contribution to our Nation's security.

Question. Do you believe it is important to ensure a unique organizational identity for the NNSA within the Department of Energy (DOE)? What steps would you take to ensure such an identity if confirmed?

Answer. I do. Through the NNSA Act, Congress established NNSA as a semi-autonomous part of DOE. In my past assignments, I have always been an ardent champion of the organizations and people entrusted to my leadership and care. I am committed to doing the same as Under Secretary for National Security and NNSA Administrator. At the same time, I also believe that common, enterprise-wide standards and best practices that reduce costs and improve efficiency, safety and security should be adopted and implemented when they make sense. I will work closely with the Secretary of Energy and consult with Members of Congress and their staffs in considering such opportunities while at the same time and ensuring that NNSA fulfills its unique role and responsibilities.

PRIORITIES

Question. If confirmed, what broad priorities would you establish to address the issues that confront the Under Secretary for Nuclear Security and Administrator of the NNSA?

Answer. If confirmed, my highest priority will be to ensure that NNSA delivers on its commitments to national security objectives. This includes ensuring the Nation's nuclear weapon stockpile is safe, secure, and effective now and in the future. It also includes working to ensure the NNSA is conducting leading-edge scientific research, preventing nuclear materials from falling into the hands of terrorists and would-be proliferators, supporting the Navy's nuclear reactor program, modernizing NNSA's capabilities and organization in today's fiscally constrained environment, and in protecting the safety and security of its sites, its employees, and the public.

OVERALL MANAGEMENT

Question. What is your view on the relationship and the relative duties and responsibilities of the Secretary of Energy as found in the Atomic Energy Act and the Administrator of the NNSA?

Answer. By statute, the Secretary of Energy is responsible for establishing policy for the NNSA and may also direct the DOE officials who are not within the NNSA to review the programs and activities of NNSA and to make recommendations to the Secretary regarding administration of those programs and activities, including consistency with similar programs and activities of DOE. The provisions governing the duties and responsibilities of the NNSA Administrator provide broad authority to manage the administration, under the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary. I fully share Secretary Moniz's strong commitment to ensure that NNSA fulfills mission tasks enumerated in section 3211 of the NNSA Act, while ensuring that all operations and activities are consistent with the principles of protecting the environment and safeguarding the safety and health of the public and workforce of NNSA.

Question. Do you believe that there are any organizational structure issues in the NNSA that should be addressed to improve management and operations of the NNSA, or that you would address if confirmed?

Answer. NNSA faces several challenges, from concerns with project management and cost overruns to serious security lapses, which will need to be addressed. If confirmed, I plan to draw upon my recent experience as the first commander of Air Force Global Strike Command to establish clear lines of authority, responsibility and accountability, while also placing a strong emphasis on strengthening the safety and security culture. Additionally, I believe the partnerships between the headquarters and the field, and between Federal employees and the laboratories and plants must be strengthened.

Question. The NNSA and DOE have been plagued by cost overruns and project cancellations related to the construction of nuclear facilities, nuclear weapons modernization programs, and nuclear stockpile stewardship facilities.

How serious are these cost overruns in your view?

Answer. It is critical that NNSA's weapons modernization and infrastructure modernization efforts, including capital asset projects, deliver on cost and schedule; otherwise, it puts at risk its fundamental ability to execute its mission.

I understand that NNSA has recently taken steps designed to improve acquisition and project management for capital asset projects, and that projects less than $750 million have been removed from the Government Accountability Office's High Risk List. If confirmed, I will focus on how the NNSA can apply the same acquisition and project management rigor to projects over $750 million.

With regard to weapons modernization, the United States now has the oldest stockpile in its history and the smallest stockpile since the Eisenhower administration. As the NNSA enters a period increased work activity not seen since the Cold War, it must incorporate sound engineering judgments in even its earliest cost estimates. If confirmed, I will remain committed to these project management principles across all of NNSA's acquisitions and projects.

Question. What steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure they are not repeated in the future?

Answer. If confirmed, and in following the Secretary's vision, I will support strengthening and improving contract and project management across NNSA by:

- Strengthening rigorous and well-justified alternative assessments and evaluations;
- Strengthening cost estimating;
- Providing independent dedicated acquisition, project management, and oversight that aligns contract incentives with taxpayer interests;
- Providing clear lines of authority and accountability for Federal and contractor personnel;
- Managing assigned projects within the original scope and cost baselines, ensuring completed projects meet mission requirements; and
- Improving cost and schedule performance.

Question. Do you believe that the expertise of DOE personnel serving outside the NNSA can be helpful to you if confirmed? If so, how do you expect to utilize this expertise if you are confirmed?

Answer. Yes. DOE possess a wealth of talent and innovative ideas across its entire enterprise. Its laboratory, plant, and Federal employees work on some of the most technically complex projects in the Nation, delivering high quality projects safely. The NNSA should draw on DOE best practices, especially in the areas of planning, cost control, and project delivery.

Question. Are you aware of any limitations on your authority, if confirmed, to draw on that expertise?

Answer. I am not aware of any limitations on my authority, if confirmed, to draw upon that expertise.

Question. What is your view of the extent to which the NNSA is bound by the existing rules, regulations, and directives of DOE and what flexibility, if any, do you believe you would have in implementing such rules, regulations, and directives?

Answer. I understand the DOE has an order that governs program and project management for the acquisition of capital assets. While I have not been briefed, pending confirmation, on its detailed application to NNSA activities, I certainly agree with the precept that rigorous project management principles should be applied and that the Federal staff must be given the tools they need and then be held accountable and responsible for delivering the work.

Question. NNSA, in large measure, was created in response to security lapses at the Los Alamos National Laboratory. However, security lapses, particularly in 2012 at the Y–12 nuclear plant, have continued to occur. Section 3212(b)(10) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2000 provides that "the Administrator has authority over, and is responsible for all programs and activities of the administration, including administration of contracts, including the management and operations of the nuclear weapons production facilities and the national security laboratories."

If confirmed, what would be your plan to make sure that security lapses do not continue at the NNSA facilities?

Answer. The 2012 security incident at Y–12 was totally unacceptable. The accounts of the DOE Inspector General, the "three wise men," and Major General Sandy Finan describe a security culture in which responsibility for the protective force and the physical security system was divided, security equipment was not repaired in a timely fashion, compensatory measures were inadequate and improperly executed, multiple nuisance alarms led to an attitude of complacency, and security was neither rigorously nor routinely exercised and evaluated. Security and safety are, in my opinion, paramount. If confirmed, strengthening security at NNSA facilities will be the top priority. I intend to draw on my experience as the first Commander of Air Force Global Strike Command to address the security culture that exists at NNSA. Working with the Secretary of Energy, I will ensure that authority is aligned with responsibility and effective communication exists between the NNSA headquarters and the field, and that there is accountability for performance at all levels. My understanding is NNSA is in the process of implementing improved oversight mechanisms, which include clarifying roles, authorities, and functions for the organization.

Question. If confirmed, what policies would you institute to improve the manner in which managers of NNSA facilities deal with security matters?

Answer. Security of the nuclear enterprise is the responsibility of every employee of NNSA, regardless of job or rank, or in the field or headquarters. If confirmed, I will insist on strict adherence to DOE security standards and clarify lines of authority, responsibility, and accountability for meeting and maintaining those standards. The status of security systems (including all outages and estimated time of repair) will be monitored daily at NNSA headquarters; security deviations and corresponding compensatory measures will be reviewed by Federal officials both at the field and headquarters levels; security procedures and responses to alarms will be rigorously trained, exercised, and evaluated.

DEFENSE NUCLEAR NONPROLIFERATION PROGRAMS

Question. What do you see are the highest priorities of the nuclear nonproliferation programs at the NNSA?

Answer. One of the NNSA's most critical roles and responsibilities is developing policies and programs with other departments on behalf of the U.S. Government to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons, materials, technology, and expertise. This includes international and domestic activities such as removing and eliminating excess weapons usable material; consolidating and securing vulnerable nuclear material; strengthening physical protection and material control; implementing a second line of defense to interdict nuclear trafficking; and controlling the export and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) expertise. The NNSA is nearing completion of a remarkable 4-year effort to implement the vision and call to action by President Obama and the Nuclear Security Summits. I understand NNSA is intently focused on a strategy and game plan for nuclear nonproliferation program for the coming years. If confirmed, I will fully support and champion these critically important mission.

Question. The United States recently renewed the bilateral agreement with Russia for joint nuclear nonproliferation activities but a growing number of programs are focused on states other than the former Soviet Union.

Do you believe that there are additional opportunities for cooperation with states outside of the former Soviet Union, particularly the Middle East and North Africa? If confirmed what would be your priorities in these areas?

Answer. Yes. I understand that NNSA is actively engaged in more than 120 countries, including in the Middle East and North Africa, with projects to secure and remove nuclear and radiological materials; convert civilian research reactors and medical isotope production facilities from highly enriched uranium (HEU) to low enriched uranium; safeguard and secure nuclear materials from theft; control the spread of WMD-related material and expertise; cooperate on Nuclear Security Centers of Excellence; and detect and interdict nuclear and radiological trafficking. If confirmed, I would continue to prioritize nonproliferation efforts and ensure that NNSA programs achieve sustainable threat reduction.

Question. What do you believe is the greatest challenge in the nuclear nonproliferation programs with Russia?

Answer. The greatest challenge with Russia is to ensure that Moscow fully assumes responsibility for all aspects of its own nuclear security by the end of 2017 (a deadline for the CTR Russia programs established in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2011). While Russia has made, and continues to make, significant improvements in its support for nuclear security, there is concern about the long-term ability and willingness of the Russian government to adequately fund nuclear security needs at the site and national levels. The level of risk-reduction achieved with U.S. support is significant and has been maintained through continued U.S. engagement and sustainability assistance. Continued engagement at the highest levels of government will be extremely important. If confirmed, I will ensure that NNSA continues to work with its Russian counterparts to prepare as fully as possible for the phase-out of U.S. financial assistance.

Question. What do you believe are the greatest challenge in nuclear nonproliferation programs with countries other than Russia?

Answer. I believe there are a number of challenges outside of Russia, including significant stockpiles of HEU, global inventories of plutonium, and high-activity radiological sources that remain vulnerable to theft around the world. The existence of this material, in combination with the increasing sophistication of trafficking networks and the continued interest by states and non-state actors in acquiring nuclear materials, poses a serious threat to the security of the United States and its allies and partners.

Another significant challenge lies in promoting the benefits of peaceful nuclear energy while reducing the risks of nuclear proliferation. To this end, NNSA works in over 70 countries around the globe to strengthen nuclear safeguards and security and works closely with DOE's Office of Nuclear Energy to ensure that new technology and security advance together.

Finally, a major challenge NNSA faces in many of its international programs is the lack of infrastructure, resources, and technical capabilities in partner countries that often inhibit the level of cooperation or amount of assistance a country can or is willing to absorb.

Question. In your view what are the three greatest unmet nuclear nonproliferation problems? Would you propose to address these needs if confirmed? What resources or cooperation would you need to meet such needs?

Answer. In my view, the three greatest unmet nuclear nonproliferation problems are: (1) non-compliance with international agreements and U.N. Security Council Resolutions, particularly by Iran, North Korea, and Syria; (2) ensuring terrorists never acquire a nuclear weapon or weapons-usable material; and (3) minimizing the proliferation risks associated with the expansion of nuclear energy, including limiting the spread of sensitive enrichment and reprocessing technology and ensuring that newcomer states have the resources and training to develop safe and secure nuclear programs.

If confirmed, I will work hard to ensure that NNSA maintains the technology, policy, and implementation competencies needed to inform and support a whole-of-government nonproliferation strategy as well as the rapid-response ability needed to mitigate threats at a moment's notice. The national security laboratories play a critical role in this regard.

MEGAPORTS

Question. The megaports program is coordinated with other work that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) is carrying out in foreign ports.

In your view are there opportunities to improve cooperation with DHS?

Answer. I understand that NNSA's Office of the Second Line of Defense (SLD) and DHS' Container Security Initiative (CSI) closely coordinate on their complementary yet distinct efforts at foreign seaports. To formalize this cooperation, SLD and CSI developed and implemented a Standard Operating Procedure (SOP) document in December 2012. This SOP outlines areas of cooperation and specific actions that each program can undertake to ensure continued close cooperation and coordination. If confirmed, I will monitor this SOP to ensure it provides the necessary framework to ensure close cooperation between the SLD and CSI programs.

Question. One of the continuing challenges to the megaports program, as well as other programs designed to detect nuclear and radiological materials, is that the materials that could pose the greatest risk, plutonium and highly enriched uranium, are the most difficult to detect. NNSA has the responsibility for basic detection research and development programs. While other agencies, such as DHS, have responsibility for near-term development efforts, and the Department of Defense has responsibilities as well.

Are the various detection efforts fully coordinated, or do you believe that additional efforts at coordination are needed?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that NNSA's detection efforts are well coordinated among NNSA, DHS, and DOD. I understand that NNSA maximizes the equipment it currently deploys to focus on this type of material.

NONPROLIFERATION RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Question. In addition to the detection technologies mentioned above, NNSA has responsibility for a broad range of research and development efforts.

If confirmed what would be your nonproliferation research and development priorities?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that NNSA will continue to prioritize research and development that supports implementation of the President's nuclear security priorities and the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review. This research and development includes developing technical capabilities to detect foreign nuclear weapons development, detect nuclear detonations, detect the movement or diversion of special nuclear materials, monitor compliance with nuclear arms control and nonproliferation agreements, discourage the unnecessary spread of enrichment technology, and inform policymakers of current and future technical capabilities available for meeting potential nuclear nonproliferation and arms control treaty objectives.

Question. Do you believe that there are research and development areas that need more attention or funding?

Answer. NNSA seeks to sustain commitment levels for research and development of both unilateral and multilateral technical capabilities to detect, identify, and characterize foreign nuclear weapons programs, the illicit diversion of special nuclear materials, and foreign nuclear detonations. For this last focus area, NNSA must sustain funding that permits production of nuclear detection satellite payloads at a rate in accordance with the delivery schedule negotiated with the Air Force.

FISSILE MATERIALS DISPOSITION

Question. The United States and Russia have each committed to the disposition of 34 tons of weapons grade plutonium so that it will not be used for weapons purposes. This is a very expensive program and has had many difficulties associated with it.

What is your understanding of the current status of the U.S. and Russian efforts to agree upon a mutual date to complete disposition of the respective 34 tons of weapons grade plutonium?

Answer. The United States is fully committed to eliminating surplus nuclear material and to the U.S.-Russian Plutonium Management and Disposition Agreement (PMDA). While I understand that the PMDA provides a target start date and minimum annual rate of disposition, it is silent on a completion date.

Question. What plans are there to dispose of additional amounts of weapons grade plutonium?

Answer. I am aware of the U.S. 2007 declaration of additional surplus plutonium beyond the 34 MT covered by the PMDA and that the PMDA does include provisions whereby the United States and Russia could dispose of additional material. However, I am not personally aware of any agreement between the United States and Russia to dispose of additional material above the 34MT.

WEAPONS PROGRAMS PERSONNEL

Question. If confirmed, what specific steps would you take to retain critical nuclear weapons expertise in both the NNSA and the contractor workforce?

Answer. The key to recruiting and retaining top-flight personnel, in my mind, is to provide them challenging and intrinsically interesting work, as well as world-class laboratory equipment and diagnostic tools. Additionally, leaders at all levels—both in Washington and in the field—must regularly communicate the importance of NNSA's mission and that they value the contribution NNSA people make to the organization and to the Nation. NNSA also needs to support a strong connection with the academic community to ensure future generations are trained in technical areas relevant to NNSA's mission.

Question. Do you support retaining the capability to remanufacture every component expected to be found in the stockpile in the near term?

Answer. Nuclear deterrence and responsiveness depend on the immediate capabilities of NNSA's people and infrastructure. Many components can be re-used to support stockpile requirements in the near-term, and in those instances I will advocate for that option. However, the current stockpile is the oldest in the Nation's history and may require a cost-effective option to re-manufacture certain components to meet specific needs. As such, NNSA must preserve the fundamental capability to re-manufacture components, when necessary to support a lean, modern, and reliable nuclear weapons stockpile.

Question. What is your understanding of the most pressing remanufacturing needs?

Answer. Today, NNSA faces several critical needs (in terms of its total remanufacturing capability). However, it is my understanding that the most pressing capability at this point is the means to re-manufacture plutonium pits. Additionally, the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review confirmed the need for a modern physical infrastructure that can support the base workload and provide a modest capacity to surge production if directed to do so by the President. NNSA has implemented management strategies, to include improved energy sustainability that ensures existing facilities and infrastructure are sustainable, safe, efficient, and reliable. These facilities include the recently constructed Kansas City Responsive Infrastructure Manufacturing and Sourcing; the High-Explosive (HE) Pressing Facility (which will become the DOE Center of Excellence for HE pressing when complete in 2016); the planned Uranium Capabilities Replacement Project; and implemented Tritium Responsive Infrastructure Modifications.

STOCKPILE STEWARDSHIP PROGRAM

Question. The Stockpile Stewardship program has successfully supported the annual nuclear weapons certification effort for the last 20 years.

What impact do you believe not achieving sustained ignition or burn at the National Ignition Facility (NIF) will have on the stockpile stewardship program?

Answer. Scientific experiments that probe the physical properties and dynamics of nuclear weapons are vital to ensuring confidence in the safety, security, and reliability of the stockpile. A broad range of experimental facilities develop the data that underpin the assessments of the current health of the stockpile and approaches to life extension programs. These include NNSA's Inertial Confinement Fusion facilities—the NIF at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and Z machine at Sandia. The ability to correctly model ignition processes is an important part of that evaluation. While ignition has not yet been achieved at NIF, experiments conducted at the facility are still vitally important to developing the scientific understanding of the nuclear weapons characteristics that is essential to successfully implementing the stockpile stewardship program.

Question. If confirmed, what are your long-term plans for the NIF?

Answer. NIF will remain an essential experimental capability for understanding of the physical properties and characteristics of nuclear weapons that cannot otherwise be accessed short of a resumption of nuclear testing.

Question. Other than the NIF what capabilities, if any, would be needed to ensure that the stockpile is safe, secure, and reliable without nuclear weapons testing?

Answer. I am aware that the directors of the national laboratories rely on the data provided by a wide array of capabilities located throughout the enterprise to assess different aspects nuclear weapons and their safety, security and effectiveness. While on active duty, I had an opportunity to visit several of these facilities, including NIF; Los Alamos National Laboratory's DARHT; the Nevada National Nuclear Security Site's U1a complex, JASPER and Device Assembly Facility; and Sandia National Laboratory's Z facility. These and other NNSA capabilities are essential to ensuring that the stockpile is safe, secure, and reliable without nuclear weapons testing.

Question. In your view is the Stockpile Stewardship program fully coordinated with the Department of Defense?

Answer. It is my understanding the NNSA is meeting its customer's requirements in partnership with DOD and through the Nuclear Weapons Council, while managing scope requirements and fiscal constraints. NNSA has continued to issue the biannual Stockpile Stewardship and Management Plan, the most recent version having been signed out by Secretary Moniz in June 2013.

Question. The Nuclear Weapons Council has laid out a schedule over the next 20 years that involves numerous demands on the NNSA, these are the B–61 life extension program (LEP), the interoperable warhead, the W–88/87 joint fuse program, the warhead for the long-range stand-off weapon, in addition to the maintenance of the existing stockpile systems (W–88, W–87, W–76, W78, B–61, B–83, and W–80).

What issues do you see in this ambitious schedule that concern you?

Answer. Our Nation is currently facing an acute dilemma brought on by the need for continued investment in an aging nuclear weapons stockpile and infrastructure in a fiscally-constrained environment. The specific budget measures and higher-than-anticipated program costs have led the NWC to agree to defer needed modernization efforts. If confirmed, I will ensure that the NNSA commits to a series of programmatic decisions for future improvements by baselining the alignment of nuclear delivery platforms with warhead life extension programs and supporting infrastructure; supporting implementation of a long-term vision for the stockpile; and embarking upon a series of key modernization initiatives. The sheer number of life extension programs and modernization efforts planned over the next 20 years will create a significant workload. Adhering to carefully laid out schedule will be a critical factor in achieving success. Programs must stay on track, and that in turn requires constancy of purpose, as well as consistent and predictable funding levels.

Question. Are you concerned this schedule is achievable if sequestration continues?

Answer. Yes. Absolutely. Any organization executing technically complex, unique, and long-term acquisitions needs sufficient and stable funding so as to plan and execute the agreed upon program of work. Sequestration is just one challenge.

I'm well aware from my military experience that Continuing Resolutions also exact a toll by increasing uncertainty while reducing flexibility for program adjustments as activities are completed and new ones need be initiated. This is particularly harmful to life extension programs having multiple phases of work. I am sure it will be a great challenge, if not downright impossible, for the NNSA to meet current commitments to the Department of Defense if sequestration continues. Yearly sequestration cuts cause additional, unnecessary and costly work to re-plan the complex integration between design laboratories and production plants supporting each of the LEPs and other sustainment activities as well as to re-negotiate delivery schedules with DOD. I am also greatly concerned that additional delays may be unavoidable in the event of fiscal year 2014 sequestration. Adequate budgets and budget stability and sustainment are essential to meeting program delivery objectives.

Question. The NNSA is in the early stages of an effort to develop an interoperable warhead for the W–88 and W–78 systems.

If the cost of the interoperable warhead become prohibitive would you support life extensions of the existing systems?

Answer. This should be a decision made by the Nuclear Weapons Council, reflecting military requirements, technical feasibility, and cost and schedule risk. I fully support the need for life extension programs to ensure the safety, security, and reliability of the Nation's nuclear weapon stockpile. I understand that the W78/88–1 LEP is the first interoperable warhead concept supporting the 3+2 nuclear strategy of three ballistic missile warheads and two air-launched warheads to reduce the numbers and types of nuclear weapons, consistent with the Nuclear Posture Review. I understand work is underway that will culminate in a Weapon Development and Cost Report which would inform a decision to continue the program as scoped or pursue alternate courses of action.

Question. Do you support the current scope of the B–61 mod 12 life extension program (LEP)?

Answer. As a former commander who had direct responsibility for the long-range bombers capable of delivering the B–61, I fully support the need for the B–61–12 life extension program. I understand that the Nuclear Weapons Council evaluated options ranging from a full scope LEP to replacing only aging components, and ultimately chose the lowest cost option to meet military requirements. In addition to providing for both strategic deterrence and extending deterrence to our allies, the currently envisioned LEP will also result in fewer total weapons and less material in the nuclear stockpile.

Question. Are you concerned about the overall cost of the B–61 mod 12 life extension program and if so what particular issues are of concern?

Answer. While I understand current cost estimates for the B–61–12 LEP are significant, modernizing the nuclear stockpile is critical to achieving the President Obama's direction to maintain a safe, secure, and effective deterrent while reducing the overall number of nuclear weapons. Furthermore, I understand that the B–61–12 was chosen as the lowest cost option to meet threshold military requirements; Delaying this LEP would almost certainly drive up lifecycle costs and could necessitate additional LEP activities in order to maintain credible strategic and extended deterrence capabilities.

Question. The Senate Appropriations Committee has proposed a reduction of $168 million to the President's fiscal year 2014 request for the B–61 life extension program. What impact would this reduction have on the B–61 LEP in terms of cost and schedule? How might it affect other planned LEPs?

Answer. While I am aware of proposed cuts to the B–61–12 LEP from the public record, I am not yet privy to the details of the potential impacts. Based on my experience in previous assignments, I am sure, if sustained, they would most certainly affect schedule and cost, as well as other LEPs employing the same facilities and workforce.

FACILITIES AND INFRASTRUCTURE

Question. In fiscal year 2013, the NNSA "deferred for at least 5 years" the construction of the Chemistry, Metallurgy Research Replacement Nuclear Facility (CMRR–NF).

Do you support this deferral?

Answer. I understand that the decision to defer the CMRR–NF construction for at least 5 years was necessary at the time due to reductions in the NNSA's budget request in the fiscal year 2012 cycle, competing priorities, and a further reduction of funding under the Budget Control Act. If confirmed, I will be committed to ensuring the NNSA can deliver the plutonium capabilities—including the underlying analytical capabilities and infrastructure—required to ensure the safety, security and effectiveness of the nuclear weapon stockpile.

Question. What impacts is the CMRR–NF deferral likely to have on the plutonium sustainment mission at Los Alamos when the existing CMR building is scheduled for removal in 2019?

Answer. Though I am not yet privy to all the details, I understand that the NNSA has developed a plutonium strategy, that if executed, would ensure continuity in plutonium operations at the Los Alamos National Laboratory.

Question. Due to this uncertainty with the deferral, are you concerned about retaining the core competency of plutonium scientists and other specialized personnel at Los Alamos related to it plutonium mission and what will you do to improve it?

Answer. Maintaining the core competency of the workforce at each site must be a priority for the NNSA, particularly as many scientists, engineers and technicians are approaching retirement. I firmly believe that the key to recruiting and retaining top-flight personnel is to provide them challenging and intrinsically interesting work, as well as world-class laboratory equipment, diagnostic tools, and facilities in which to work. Additionally, leaders at all levels—both in Washington and in the field—must regularly communicate the importance of the mission and that they value the contribution NNSA people make to the organization and to the Nation. Implementation of a plutonium strategy will allow for continuity in plutonium operations at Los Alamos and will assist in the retention of critical skills related to plutonium dependant missions. If confirmed, I will closely consult with Members of Congress and their staffs on the requirements for maintaining the Nation's plutonium capabilities and expertise.

Question. If alternative construction strategies such as a modular approach to CMRR–NF prove feasible will you strongly advocate for them?

Answer. I understand that the NNSA and Department of Defense are developing a business case analysis of the potential alternatives to constructing CMRR–NF, including the so-called modular approach. If confirmed, any approach I advocate will be based on this joint analysis and consultations with the Secretary of Energy.

Question. DOE and NNSA often build one of a kind or first of a kind buildings, the most recent being the Uranium Processing Facility. The NNSA recently found the project underestimated the floor space needed and had to raise its roof by some 13 feet, increasing the cost by at least $500 million. The General Accountability Office estimates to complete the full scope of the project as envisioned would be $10 billion vice the upper bound of $6.5 billion.

If confirmed, what steps would you take to ensure that NNSA construction projects are managed to be completed within budget and on time?

Answer. I have always subscribed to the principle that hiring the right people and giving them the tools they need to do their jobs is critical to achieving mission success.

If confirmed, I would be committed to assigning certified Federal Project Directors (FPDs) to all projects at the point where the important planning and design work leading to baseline development is accomplished. I understand that the NNSA has revised change control procedures to achieve visibility on potential scope increases, allowing the NNSA to manage the work proactively. As the project progresses to the construction phase, NNSA will ensure the FPDs have the appropriate training, experience, and certification level to lead the project through successful execution. NNSA has also adopted a peer review process to provide critical independent assessments of its work throughout the project life cycle.

In addition, if confirmed, I would want the NNSA to take full advantage of contracts and contract language to ensure that the best interests of all stakeholders are being met through performance requirements. NNSA has recently issued a policy that requires nuclear facilities achieve 90 percent design completion prior to the establishment of the project's baselines. The NNSA will need to clearly articulate its expectations to the contractor partners and to use the contract to hold them accountable for deficient work.

Question. What additional costing, project management, and design skills do you believe are needed in the NNSA?

Answer. NNSA must develop its Federal infrastructure and workforce to better estimate project costs, to rigorously analyze alternatives, and to more effectively manage design and construction contracts. If confirmed, I will direct NNSA's Office of Acquisition and Project Management to ensure NNSA has a solid and executable plan in place for bolstering Federal expertise in this area.

I understand that NNSA, in the interim, has an agreement with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers that will allow NNSA to draw upon the Corp's experience to support NNSA in terms of Subject Matter Expertise. NNSA is also using a Enterprise Construction Management Services contract to place Subject Matter Experts, with commercial design and construction experience, in the field to mentor and train NNSA's Federal Project Directors and Integrated Project Teams in the skills necessary to effectively manage NNSA's capital assets.

Question. At what point in the Critical Decision timeline do you believe an independent cost estimate should be performed for a construction project, and why?

Answer. I understand NNSA's current position is that an independent cost estimate should be completed at Critical Decision 2 which is the point at which the project's cost and schedule baseline is determined. At this point, the design should be sufficiently mature to more realistically estimate the total project cost.

OPERATIONAL SAFETY

Question. If confirmed, what steps will you take to ensure that nuclear and other operational safety issues are fully addressed in the design of new NNSA buildings?

Answer. If confirmed, I will be absolutely committed to the safe operation of NNSA facilities and to the protection of workers who work in them and the people who reside in the surrounding communities. I will be actively engaged in ensuring that safety is incorporated into the design and construction of NNSA nuclear facilities. Key elements would clearly include the selection of qualified nuclear design and construction firms to lead these projects, as well as a properly staffed and technically-capable Federal project team. Ensuring that appropriate safety systems and controls are identified early in the design process and are validated throughout construction is also critical to reducing rework and controlling costs during design and construction.

Question. If confirmed, what steps will you take to ensure that nuclear operational safety issues are identified by the Defense Nuclear Safety Board early in any construction design process and promptly resolved?

Answer. I understand that the Defense Nuclear Facilities Safety Board (DNFSB) has a statutory responsibility to review the design of new DOE defense nuclear facilities before construction to ensure adequate protection is afforded to public health and safety. If confirmed, I would welcome DNFSB input and advice on the safety aspects of the design and construction of NNSA nuclear facilities. As indicated previously, I believe that the identification of required safety controls early in the design process is an important element to ensuring safety and to controlling project costs. I would work closely with the DNFSB to identify any significant design concerns early in the design process and meet routinely with the Board to ensure that issues are resolved in a timely and effective manner.

NOTIFICATION OF CONGRESS

Question. If confirmed, would you commit to promptly notifying Congress of any significant issues in the safety, security, or reliability of the nuclear weapons stockpile?

Answer. If confirmed, I am committed to promptly notifying Congress of any significant issues affecting the safety, security, or reliability of the nuclear weapons stockpile.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. I agree.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Under Secretary for Nuclear Security?

Answer. I agree.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. I agree.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. I agree.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CARL LEVIN

SUPPORT FOR THE FACILITY FOR RARE ISOTOPE BEAMS

1. Senator LEVIN. Mr. Klotz, in March of this year, the National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA) submitted a report to Congress on the use of Department of Energy (DOE) Office of Science facilities in support of its stockpile stewardship program. One of the facilities it found important was the Facility for Rare Isotope Beams being constructed at Michigan State University. This facility will produce isotopes to help the NNSA better understand the physics of a nuclear weapon without testing. It will help the NNSA's nonproliferation mission by determining isotopes from an improvised nuclear device. Finally, it will help produce a future nuclear physics workforce that is so important to your overall mission. Do you agree that this isotope facility, once completed, will be important to the stockpile stewardship program?

Mr. KLOTZ. The Facility for Rare Isotope Beams (FRIB) is a new national user facility for nuclear science, funded by the Department of Energy Office of Science (DOE–SC) and operated by Michigan State University. FRIB will enable scientists to explore the properties of rare isotopes in order to, inter alia, better understand the physics of nuclei. Modeling atomic nuclei and their interactions can also help lead to breakthroughs in security, the environment, high energy physics, and nanoscience—all of which are relevant to important missions of NNSA. Additionally, FRIB will, as top priority, help educate the next generation of scientists. For all these reasons, I fully agree that once completed, this isotope facility will be important to the stockpile stewardship program, as well as sustaining the intellectual capital it needs for the future.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MARK UDALL

NUCLEAR MODERNIZATION FUNDING

2. Senator UDALL. Mr. Klotz, it has been suggested that the administration has underfunded the NNSA nuclear modernization program relative to the administration's November 2010 plan, provided to Congress pursuant to section 1251 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2010, by some 34 percent. Can you please tell the committee the sequence of events to date between requested and appropriated modernization funding since the section 1251 plan, and the amount of the fiscal year 2014 NNSA request relative to that plan?

Mr. KLOTZ. I understand that the fiscal year 2014 Stockpile Stewardship Management Plan (SSMP) reflects a $2 billion increase in funding over the projections made in fiscal year 2011 SSMP as the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START) treaty was being considered. The fiscal year 2014 projections also represent a 27 percent increase in NNSA's purchasing power for the Weapons Activities account from fiscal year 2010–fiscal year 2018. Therefore, while the fiscal climate has changed significantly since the time of New START treaty ratification, including the NNSA having to absorb additional funding reductions in fiscal year 2013 as a result of sequestration under the Budget Control Act, significant resources are being put towards nuclear modernization activities across the stockpile; the science, technology and engineering base; and the infrastructure. If confirmed, I will strongly support the funding required to carry out NNSA's varied missions, both now and in the future.

3. Senator UDALL. Mr. Klotz, can you please compare the NNSA modernization funding from fiscal year 2009 to date as compared to the funding during fiscal years 2000–2008?

Mr. KLOTZ. Nuclear modernization funding is critical to ensure the safety, security and effectiveness of the nuclear weapons stockpile. Funding for the sustainment of the stockpile and infrastructure was in decline from fiscal year 2004 through fiscal year 2009. Following release of the Nuclear Posture Review in April 2010, President Obama's budget requests for NNSA have included significant increases since fiscal year 2010 for nuclear modernization funding. Compared to fiscal year 2004 through fiscal year 2009, the fiscal year 2014 Stockpile Stewardship and Management Plan reflects a 27 percent increase in NNSA's purchasing power for the Weapons Activities account from fiscal year 2010–fiscal year 2018, which funds nuclear modernization activities across the stockpile; the science, technology and engineering base; and the infrastructure. If confirmed, I will strongly support the funding required to ensure that military requirements are met and that the infrastructure for maintaining the Nation's nuclear stockpile is modernized to meet current and future demands.

4. Senator UDALL. Mr. Klotz, there has been a lot of discussion about the cost of the B–61 modernization program. I understand this is an administration and North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) priority, but some have proposed other options—including the one called "triple alt" which has less safety and security features than what the administration proposed. What is your opinion of these proposals?

Mr. KLOTZ. The B–61 is one of the oldest nuclear weapons in the stockpile and requires a life extension program. The B–61–12 Life Extension Program (LEP) will consolidate four variants of the B–61 (-3, -4, -7 and -10) into a single mod 12 which will provide strategic and extended deterrence for an additional 20 years following the first production unit in 2019. On February 27, 2012, the Nuclear Weapons Council (consisting of representatives of the Department of Defense, U.S. Strategic Command, and NNSA) authorized the Air Force and NNSA to begin Phase 6.3 Engineering Development for the B–61–12 (the Option 3B), adopting the lowest-cost approach of the options evaluated by the Nuclear Weapons Council that fully meets military requirements to address weapon aging, safety, security and delivery system integration issues. This variant will allow the United States to reduce the number of weapons currently in the stockpile; reduce the cost of maintaining the B–61 in the future; set conditions for the future retirement of the B83 bomb; reduce the amount of special nuclear material in the stockpile; maintain the air leg of the triad; and, increase the safety and security of a critical component of the U.S. strategic and extended deterrent capabilities, both now and for the foreseeable future. The Nuclear Weapons Council rejected the proposed "Triple Alt" option as not meeting military requirements because it did not address all aging issues, it would require the immediate start of a second LEP to address those issues, and it would risk a potential capability gap until the second LEP was completed. Additionally, the Triple Alt would drive up life-cycle costs, and would not provide the critical nuclear security benefits that could lead to reductions in the technical hedge. Accordingly, I believe the approach endorsed by the Nuclear Weapons Council is the best option.

5. Senator UDALL. Mr. Klotz, the administration has proposed a large number of life extensions of our weapons systems—in addition to trying to rebuild some of the NNSA facilities that date back to the Manhattan Project. This is all happening in a time of tight budgets. Are you worried about trying to do too much without the necessary funding?

Mr. KLOTZ. There is certainly cause for concern. The fiscal uncertainty caused by sequestration under the Budget Control Act and by a series of Continuing Resolutions (in lieu of regular appropriations) creates a very challenging environment across all NNSA missions. Any organization executing technically complex, unique, and long-term programs and construction projects needs sufficient and stable funding in order to plan and execute an agreed upon program of work. The sheer number of life extension programs and modernization efforts planned over the next 20 years entails a significant workload that must be integrated across multiple laboratories and plants. Adhering to a carefully laid out schedule will be a critical factor in achieving success. Programs must stay on track, and that in turn requires constancy of purpose, as well as consistent and predictable funding levels.

6. Senator UDALL. Mr. Klotz, the administration is proposing to combine an intercontinental ballistic missile warhead, the W–78, and a submarine missile warhead, the W–88, into a common system. Are you concerned about the level of risk and cost of the undertaking as compared to performing straight life extensions of the existing warheads?

Mr. KLOTZ. If confirmed, I will gain a better understanding of all the technical details and, therefore, the risks and costs associated with this program. I am aware that work on an interoperable warhead for the Air Force and the Navy is still within the feasibility and option down-select study phase (phase 6.2) of the Nuclear Weapons Council acquisition process. Consistent with the Nuclear Posture Review, it is the policy of this administration to look at ways to reduce the number and types of weapons and the interoperable warhead concept, if realized, would achieve this goal. Managing the technical risks and ensuring sustained funding to finish the initial studies will be critical to determining the viability of this option going forward. In multiple previous assignments, I had responsibility for the operation, maintenance and security of deployed nuclear warheads, so I am keenly interested in this issue and, if confirmed, will carefully oversee NNSA's work on it.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY LABORATORIES

7. Senator UDALL. Mr. Klotz, DOE national laboratories make significant contributions to national security through various DOE, DOD, Department of Homeland Security, and Intelligence Community efforts. The NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 officially designated the three NNSA nuclear weapons labs (Los Alamos National Laboratory, Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, Sandia National Laboratories) as "national security" labs. However, the committee provided clarification in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2014 that this designation did not preclude the Federal Government from accessing and leveraging any and all DOE national laboratories, such as Idaho National Laboratory, Oak Ridge National Laboratory, and Pacific Northwest National Laboratory, for the purpose of national security. As Administrator, how do you plan to ensure that these and the other national laboratories are fully and directly engaged in the national security efforts undertaken by NNSA?

Mr. KLOTZ. If confirmed, I will strive ensure that the best capabilities and brightest minds are brought to bear on NNSA's national security missions, including stockpile stewardship, nonproliferation, and reducing nuclear threats. I understand that the NNSA nonproliferation mission, for example, already draws upon the talent and expertise resident at Pacific Northwest National Laboratory, Oak Ridge National Laboratory, Idaho National Laboratory, and other laboratories. It is vitally important these and other national laboratories are fully engaged in the national security efforts undertaken by NNSA.

8. Senator UDALL. Mr. Klotz, the administration has proposed deferring indefinitely the plutonium facility at Los Alamos and using a temporary alternative. Are you at all concerned about this temporary strategy on the long-term plutonium science mission of Los Alamos and is there reason to be worried that under the current fiscal conditions, the temporary strategy will become permanent?

Mr. KLOTZ. If confirmed, I am committed to ensuring the NNSA delivers plutonium capability—including the underlying analytical capabilities and infrastructure—required to ensure the safety, security and effectiveness of the nuclear weapon stockpile. I understand that the NNSA and Department of Defense are developing a business case analysis of the potential alternatives to constructing the CMRR–Nuclear Facility (NF), including a so-called modular approach. If confirmed, any approach proposed by NNSA will be informed by this joint analysis and consultations with the Secretary of Energy, as well directors of the laboratories, plants, and field offices. A successful long-term plutonium mission at Los Alamos is essential to meeting mission deliverables and maintaining a top-flight workforce consisting of scientists, engineers, and technicians and providing them with challenging and intrinsically interesting work, as well as world-class laboratory equipment, diagnostic tools, and facilities in which to work.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY/NATIONAL NUCLEAR SECURITY ADMINISTRATION RELATIONSHIP

9. Senator UDALL. Mr. Klotz, last year, because of poor mission performance there was debate regarding whether the NNSA should continue to report to the Secretary of Energy as a semi-autonomous agency within DOE. What are your views on this issue?

Mr. KLOTZ. My view is that the NNSA should continue to report to the Secretary of Energy as a semi-autonomous agency within DOE, as provided for by law. I believe the mission of the NNSA benefits significantly by having a cabinet-level representative in the Secretary of Energy. The well-documented challenges confronting the NNSA—from project management concerns, to cost overruns, to serious security lapses—can and must be addressed using existing authorities granted to the Secretary of Energy and the Administrator of the NNSA through the Atomic Energy Act and the NNSA Act, respectively. I fully share Secretary Moniz's strong commitment to ensure that NNSA fulfills mission tasks enumerated in section 3211 of the NNSA Act, while ensuring that all operations and activities are consistent with the principles of protecting the environment and safeguarding the safety and health of the public and workforce of the NNSA and its contractors.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KAY R. HAGAN

NUCLEAR NONPROLIFERATION IN THE MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICA

10. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Klotz, in addition to the proliferation of chemical weapons, there is concern in this committee about the proliferation of nuclear material and know-how in the Middle East and North Africa region. The NNSA maintains personnel at a number of embassies around the world to work with the host nation and the U.S. Embassy on joint nonproliferation efforts. If confirmed, will you report back to this committee on whether you can post NNSA personnel in this region of the world to work on nonproliferation issues?

Mr. KLOTZ. Yes, if confirmed, I will report back to the committee on whether the DOE/NNSA can post personnel in the Middle East and North Africa region to focus on these critical nonproliferation issues. I also understand that NNSA's nonproliferation programs are actively engaged in more than 120 countries, including in the Middle East and North Africa region. I pledge to remain committed to these activities.

EMERGENCY RESPONSE

11. Senator HAGAN. Mr. Klotz, the NNSA is a unique resource in the Federal Government for responding to radiological emergencies. The most recent example was the use of NNSA's sophisticated detectors to track the radioactive plume from the stricken Fukushima reactor in Japan. The NNSA's Second Line of Defense program helps countries around the world install radiation detectors at airports and other ports of entry. It seems to me that an important extension of this mission would be helping other countries develop emergency response capabilities for detecting nuclear materials from an accident or a terrorist incident. If confirmed, will you report back to the committee on efforts you are taking or could take in this particular area?

Mr. KLOTZ. If confirmed, I will report back to the committee on efforts the NNSA is taking and could take to support the development of international emergency response capabilities to detect nuclear materials from an accident or a terrorist incident. The NNSA has complementary divisions that devote resources to different international nuclear and radioactive challenges. These include the NNSA's Second Line of Defense Program which installs radiation detection systems at a variety of sites and assists countries with the development of national response plans for emergency nuclear and radiological events. The NNSA's Office of Emergency Operations also currently works with other countries and the International Atomic Energy Agency to develop nuclear/radiological emergency response capabilities. If confirmed, I will work to continue to provide assistance to countries around the world to support a compatible, effective, and efficient worldwide nuclear/radiological emergency response capability.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

NUCLEAR MODERNIZATION

12. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Klotz, Congress has serious concerns about the management of the NNSA in areas such as cost growth, schedule slips, security and planning. If confirmed, how do you propose to establish confidence in NNSA's ability to manage major construction projects and life extension programs for our aging nuclear force?

Mr. KLOTZ. It is critical that the NNSA's weapons modernization and infrastructure modernization efforts, including capital construction projects, be completed on cost and on schedule. Otherwise, NNSA's fundamental ability to execute its mission is put at risk. If confirmed, I will place immediate emphasis on working with the Secretary of Energy, as well as the directors of the national security laboratories, plants and field offices to: (1) clarify lines of authority, responsibility, and accountability within the entire NNSA enterprise; and (2) identify steps to streamline business processes and eliminate needlessly burdensome, non-value-added activities that may undermine the NNSA enterprise and its incentive to innovate. I will likewise focus on adopting measures to significantly improve NNSA's capabilities for more complete front-end project planning, cost estimation, project management, and oversight of capital construction projects and life extension programs.

13. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Klotz, the B–61 has already been delayed 3 years—what are the implications for U.S. security if the Senate Appropriations Committee mark becomes law?

Mr. KLOTZ. Based on my prior experiences at the Department of Defense, I fully understand that schedule delays and budget uncertainty in any major weapons systems acquisition program drive up overall costs and adversely impact the recruitment and retention of the workforce needed to successfully complete technically complex projects. If the NNSA does not have sufficient funding to move forward with the B–61–12 LEP, as endorsed by the interagency Nuclear Weapons Council, NNSA's ability to meet scope and schedule will be put at risk, with serious implications for the Nation's strategic and extended deterrence capabilities, as well as its ability to sustain a safe, secure, and effective stockpile and to retire weapons that are no longer needed.

14. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Klotz, how would you propose to work with the administration and Congress to restore full funding for the B–61?

Mr. KLOTZ. The B–61 is one of the oldest nuclear weapons in the stockpile and requires a life extension program. The B–61–12 LEP will consolidate four variants of the B–61 (-3, -4, -7 and -10) into a single mod 12 which will provide strategic and extended deterrence for an additional 20 years following the first production unit in 2019. On February 27, 2012, the Nuclear Weapons Council (consisting of representatives of the Department of Defense, U.S. Strategic Command, and NNSA) authorized the Air Force and NNSA to begin Phase 6.3 Engineering Development for the B–61–12 (the Option 3B), adopting the lowest-cost approach of the options evaluated by the Nuclear Weapons Council that fully meets military requirements to address weapon aging, safety, security and delivery system integration issues. This variant will allow the United States to reduce the number of weapons currently in the stockpile; reduce the cost of maintaining the B–61 in the future; set conditions for the future retirement of the B83 bomb; reduce the amount of special nuclear material in the stockpile; maintain the air leg of the triad; and, increase the safety and security of a critical component of the U.S. strategic and extended deterrent capabilities, both now and for the foreseeable future. The Nuclear Weapons Council rejected the proposed "Triple Alt" option as not meeting military requirements because it did not address all aging issues, it would require the immediate start of a second LEP to address those issues, and it would risk a potential capability gap until the second LEP was completed. Additionally, the Triple Alt would drive up life-cycle costs, and would not provide the critical nuclear security benefits that could lead to reductions in the technical hedge. Accordingly, I believe the approach endorsed by the Nuclear Weapons Council is the best option.

If confirmed, I will work with the Department of Defense (primarily through the Nuclear Weapons Council), the National Security Staff, as well as Members of Congress and their staffs to ensure the facts regarding the B–61 life extension program and the serious implications of reduced or delayed funding are fully understood.

15. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Klotz, will you be a forceful advocate for those nuclear modernization commitments that were made to secure the New START treaty?

Mr. KLOTZ. Yes. If confirmed, I will be a forceful advocate for nuclear modernization funding as related to the ratification of the New START treaty, and as outlined in the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review and the 2013 updated Nuclear Weapons Employment Strategy of the United States.

16. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Klotz, on April 29, the Government Accountability Office upheld a procurement protest regarding the combined Y–12 National Security Complex and Pantex Plant management contracts. Press reports suggest that some scores were changed at the 11th hour of the process, which had an impact on the result. Can you assure us, if you are confirmed, you would look into this award and protest to ensure the integrity of the procurement process moving forward?

Mr. KLOTZ. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on any ongoing government contract competition. However, it is my long-held personal view that all government contracting activities must be conducted fairly, with integrity, and in a manner that allows all stakeholders to have full confidence in the process.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SAXBY CHAMBLISS

NEW STRATEGIC ARMS REDUCTION TREATY RATIFICATION

17. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Klotz, in your advance policy questions you stated that "the NNSA has a unique responsibility for pursuing two different, but complementary principles that have traditionally guided American nuclear weapons policy. The first is that the United States must continue to lead international efforts to limit and reduce nuclear arsenals, prevent nuclear proliferation and terrorism, and secure nuclear materials across the globe. The second is that appropriately-sized nuclear forces still play an essential role in protecting U.S. and allied security interests, even as the United States seeks to reduce the overall number and role of nuclear weapons in our national security policy." While these statements seem solid in principal, I'm concerned they conflict with our agreement to maintain a nuclear arsenal as defined in the New START treaty, especially your stated second responsibility of reducing the overall number and role of nuclear weapons in our national security policy. In particular, I am concerned the administration is backing away from promises made to modernize the entire nuclear enterprise—warheads, delivery platforms, and supporting infrastructure—in order to secure Senate ratification. If confirmed, will you aggressively advocate modernization of the nuclear enterprise to guarantee the United States maintains a safe, reliable, and credible nuclear deterrent?

Mr. KLOTZ. I have personally been associated with the nuclear deterrent mission for nearly 4 decades, including leading the major command responsible for all Air Force nuclear-capable long-range bombers and intercontinental ballistic missiles. I strongly believe that the U.S. nuclear deterrent forces still play an essential role in protecting U.S. and allied security interests, and will do so for many years to come. Accordingly, the United States must maintain a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent. The NNSA plays a critical role in achieving this objective through its stewardship of the nuclear weapon stockpile. If confirmed, I will aggressively advocate and pursue the programs and funding necessary to successfully complete nuclear weapon life extension programs to meet national policy goals and military requirements; to assess the health and safety of the stockpile; and, to modernize the aging infrastructure associated with critical plutonium, uranium, and other stockpile-related operations.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

NATIONAL NUCLEAR SECURITY ADMINISTRATION SECURITY OF CRITICAL INFRASTRUCTURE

18. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Klotz, in July 2012 at its Y–12 site, NNSA suffered a multifaceted security failure that allowed three trespassers to deface one of agency's newest and most secure facilities. Though steps have been taken to correct deficiencies, NNSA's efforts to establish the right kinds of security at its headquarters and field sites are still developing some 14 months after the Y–12 incident. In your view, what led to the Y–12 incident?

Mr. KLOTZ. I have carefully reviewed the publically available accounts of the Y–12 security failure provided by the DOE Inspector General, the review conducted by Major General Sandy Finan, and the expert opinions requested by former Energy Secretary Chu. In my view, based on this information, the incident occurred because of a multifaceted, systemic failure of the approach to security at the plant and within NNSA headquarters: responsibility for the protective force and the physical security system was divided, security equipment was not repaired in a timely fashion, compensatory measures were inadequate and improperly executed, multiple nuisance alarms led to an attitude of complacency. Furthermore, oversight of security was neither rigorously, nor routinely, exercised and evaluated.

19. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Klotz, does it suggest anything to you about the NNSA's security culture?

Mr. KLOTZ. Because safety and security are paramount to the NNSA's mission, it will be my responsibility, if confirmed, to ensure the process of implementing improved oversight mechanisms, which include clarifying roles, authorities, and functions for the organization, is completed successfully. I want to emphasize that the 2012 security incident at Y–12 was totally unacceptable. Security of the nuclear enterprise is the responsibility of every employee of the NNSA, regardless of job, or rank.

20. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Klotz, if culture plays a role, what actions do you plan to take to instill cultural change?

Mr. KLOTZ. If confirmed, strengthening security at NNSA facilities will be one of my top priorities. I intend to draw on my experience as the first Commander of Air Force Global Strike Command to address the security culture that exists at the NNSA. Working with the Secretary of Energy, I will insist on strict adherence to DOE security standards and clarify lines of authority, responsibility, and accountability for meeting and maintaining those standards. In my experience, it is critical to remind all levels of the organization that security is an urgent mission, and that complacency will not be tolerated. To accomplish this, the status of security systems (including all outages and estimated time of repair) must be monitored daily at NNSA headquarters; security deviations and corresponding compensatory measures will be reviewed by Federal officials both at the field and headquarters levels; security procedures and responses to alarms will be rigorously trained, exercised, and evaluated.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR ROY BLUNT

GLOBAL SUPPLY OF MO-99

21. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Klotz, I understand ensuring a stable and reliable supply of medical isotope molybdenum-99 (Mo-99) for the benefit of physicians and patients is a key priority for your office. I am hopeful that, if confirmed, you would work constructively with affected stakeholders to ensure the transition to non-highly enriched uranium (HEU) based production occurs smoothly and without jeopardizing patient access to much-needed diagnostic tools. How are you monitoring the global supply of Mo-99 and working with foreign governments to ensure the U.S. Government continues to provide needed material while this transition is underway?

Mr. KLOTZ. If confirmed, I intend to continue NNSA's efforts to accelerate the establishment of reliable Mo-99 supplies produced without HEU, so that patients have uninterrupted access to sources of this important medical isotope that are also consistent with international HEU minimization commitments. Regular interaction with foreign government, commercial industry, and medical community stakeholders are essential. If confirmed, I will be committed to this interaction and to monitoring the global supply.

DISPOSITION OF BANNISTER COMPLEX

22. Senator BLUNT. Mr. Klotz, what is your vision for the eventual disposition of the Bannister Federal Complex in Kansas City regarding its remediation and redevelopment?

Mr. KLOTZ. The NNSA has successfully developed a new, highly efficient facility for Kansas City Plant operations. Upon full transition to the new facility, the NNSA will work to transfer the previous facility—the Bannister Federal Complex (BFC)—to a new owner for redevelopment under established protocols. The goals for disposition are transfer of the property providing for demolition of obsolete facilities, remediation of legacy environmental contamination, and successful redevelopment of the property to continue contributing to the economy of Kansas City. If confirmed, you have my commitment to work closely with you, the other members of the Missouri and Kansas congressional delegations, and community leaders to ensure the BFC disposition process is undertaken as expeditiously and effectively as possible.

113th Congress, on January 6, 2014, under provisions of Senate Rule XXXI, paragraph 6, of the Standing Rules of the Senate.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Mr. Marcel J. Lettre II by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DUTIES

Question. What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (PDUSD(I))?

Answer. My understanding is that the Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (PDUSD(I)) is responsible for assisting the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (USD(I)) in supporting the Secretary of Defense in discharging his intelligence-related responsibilities and authorities under title 10 and title 50 of the United States Code (U.S.C.).

This includes: serving as the principal intelligence advisor to the Secretary of Defense; exercising authority, direction, and control on behalf of the Secretary of Defense over all intelligence organizations within the Department of Defense (DOD); ensuring that intelligence organizations in DOD are manned, organized, trained, and equipped to support the missions of the Department; ensuring that the DOD components, which are also elements of the Intelligence Community, are responsive to the Director of National Intelligence (DNI) in the execution of the DNI's authorities; ensuring that the combatant commanders, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the civilian leadership of the Department are provided with appropriate intelligence support; ensuring that counterintelligence activities in the Department are conducted and managed efficiently and effectively; ensuring that other sensitive activities which the Department conducts or supports are conducted and managed efficiently and effectively; overseeing Defense Department personnel, facility, and industrial security to ensure efficiency and effectiveness; serving as the Program Executive for the Military Intelligence Program, and ensuring that the DOD Components funded by the National Intelligence Program are robust, balanced, and in compliance with the guidance and direction of the DNI; and ensuring that the Department provides the U.S. Congress with intelligence-related information sufficient to execute its oversight responsibilities.

Question. What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform these duties?

Answer. If confirmed, I believe I have the proper background and experience to effectively perform the duties of the Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence. I have been honored to serve as Special Assistant under three Secretaries of Defense from 2011 to the present. In that capacity, I advised the Secretary of Defense on a range of matters pertaining to U.S. national security, including intelligence-related matters. With functional responsibilities as the civilian deputy chief of staff to Secretary Panetta, I supported the Secretary of Defense on defense strategy, budget development, acquisition oversight, national security policy initiatives, and crisis management. I also led two Secretary of Defense transition teams. For my work in support of Secretary of Defense priorities, I am honored that Secretary Panetta awarded me the Defense Distinguished Public Service Award.

As Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Legislative Affairs, I had responsibilities on a team executing legislative programs on Departmental priorities including the defense budget and policy; Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan; strategic nuclear arms control matters, including the ratification of the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty; acquisition and export control reforms; information operations, and Secretary Gates' efficiencies initiative. For my work on strategic nuclear arms control matters, Secretary Gates awarded me the Exceptional Public Service Award.

As Senior Defense and Intelligence Advisor and then as Senior National Security Advisor to the U.S. Senate Majority Leader, I handled all "Gang of Eight" intelligence matters for the Leader, and shaped legislation and policy initiatives in areas including: Iraq and Afghanistan strategy; counterterrorism; enhancing foreign intelligence collection and sensitive intelligence operations; countering proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD); and assisting in securing passage of defense and intelligence authorization bills, appropriations bills, and war supplementals.

As a Professional Staff Member on the U.S. House of Representatives Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, I supported the intelligence after-action reviews on the September 11 terrorist attacks and on Iraqi WMD, and advised on the 2004

Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act which created the Director of National Intelligence.

Prior to these positions, I served in the private sector, the foreign policy research sector, and on a congressional commission examining the organization and efficiency of the U.S. Government regarding intelligence and programs to counter WMD.

Serving in both the legislative and executive branches of the Government has given me a multi-faceted appreciation for the role of intelligence. I have served as an intelligence consumer, ensuring the Nation's senior decisionmakers are supported with intelligence products on important decisions. I have gained an appreciation of the statutory roles of the Secretary of Defense, the Director of National Intelligence, and other senior leaders in ensuring effective intelligence capabilities. I have familiarity with a range of intelligence operations and capabilities. I have experience working intelligence resourcing issues through the National Intelligence Program and Military Intelligence Program, knowledge of key trajectories for our acquisition and investment programs, and some awareness of key counterintelligence and security priorities. I am personally committed to supporting the Secretary of Defense in focusing on the needs of the warfighter, particularly in intelligence support.

Finally, my experience has given me a deep appreciation for the important role of oversight, from within the executive branch as well as by the legislative and judiciary branches.

Question. Do you believe that there are actions you need to take to enhance your ability to perform the duties of the PDUSD(I)?

Answer. If confirmed, I believe the most significant action that I would need to take would be to assist Under Secretary Vickers in executing his priorities, consistent with the priorities of the Secretary of Defense, by enhancing my understanding of, and assessing the effectiveness of, plans and activities to implement and operationalize those priorities. I also believe that I need to more deeply understand the challenges posed by the new fiscal environment, the resource constraints that will be faced ahead, and the opportunities for further efficiencies across the Defense Intelligence Enterprise, as we sustain and strengthen OUSD(I)'s budgetary oversight.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what duties and functions do you expect that the Secretary of Defense would prescribe for you?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to speaking with the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence and the Secretary of Defense about how best I could support them. I anticipate that my duties and functions would include advising and assisting the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence and the Secretary of Defense on intelligence planning, policy and resources. I believe they would expect me to assist the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence in ensuring full intelligence support for ongoing operations; ensuring that intelligence operations conducted by DOD are effective and in compliance with all relevant statutes, authorities, directives, and policies; ensuring that the Defense Intelligence Enterprise is postured to prevent strategic surprise; ensuring, without abrogating the Secretary's statutory responsibilities, that the DNI has visibility and oversight over the full range of intelligence activities in the Department; and ensuring that the Defense Intelligence Enterprise is as efficient as possible. They may also assign me other duties as their priorities and my background and experience warrant.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. In carrying out your duties, how will you work with the following:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. Pursuant to the authority, direction, and control of the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (USD(I)), as the USD(I)'s principal assistant, if confirmed as the Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence I will serve as an advisor to the Secretary of Defense on all matters concerning intelligence, counterintelligence, and security.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed as the Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (PDUSD(I)), I will provide support to the Deputy Secretary similar to that which I would provide to the Secretary, as described above.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence.

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will provide my full support to the USD(I) in carrying out his duties as the principal advisor to the Secretary of Defense on intelligence, counterintelligence, and security. I will keep him informed, seek his guidance and direction, and support him as he advises the Secretary of Defense on how to exercise his oversight authority on intelligence, counterintelligence, and security-related matters throughout the Department. At the outset, I will ascertain which responsibilities the USDI delegates to me, including a range of internal management functions within the Office of the Under Secretary, and focus on implementing his and the Secretary's priorities within the Office and across the Defense Intelligence Enterprise.

Question. The other Under Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. Each of the Under Secretaries has vital functions to carry out. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will work closely with each of them and their Principal Deputies and senior teams. A close relationship between the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy and the USD(I), and their Principal Deputies, is particularly important, so I intend to fully support those relationships. In both of my former positions within the Department, both as Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense and as Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Legislative Affairs, I had positive relationships with a number of the Under Secretaries. If confirmed, I would continue to build on these relationships.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Network and Information Integration/Successor Organization.

Answer. The Chief Information Officer (CIO), like its predecessor the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Networks and Information Integration, has had oversight of enabling capabilities which are central to the conduct of intelligence and security-related activities. If confirmed, I will work closely with the CIO to ensure that this support remains robust.

Question. The Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Policy.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the DASD for Rule of Law and Detainee Policy on the intelligence aspects of detainee policy and operations.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations/Low Intensity Conflict & Interdependent Capabilities (ASD SOLIC&IC).

Answer. USD(I) and the ASD SO/LIC&IC work closely together on several important matters, and this close partnership has grown substantially during Dr. Vickers' tenure as USD(I). If confirmed as the PDUSD(I), I will contribute to ensuring that this close partnership continues.

Question. The Service Secretaries and the Service Intelligence Directors.

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will support the USD(I) as the Program Executive for the Military Intelligence Program. As appropriate, I will work with the Secretaries of the Military Departments and the Service Intelligence Directors to ensure their intelligence requirements are met, that the Military Departments and Services develop intelligence capabilities appropriate for the current and future security environment, and that the intelligence organizations contribute to meeting the intelligence needs of their respective Military Department/Service, the Joint Force, the Department, and the Nation.

Question. The General Counsel of the Department of Defense.

Answer. In my previous positions in DOD, I have worked closely with the General Counsel and his staff. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will continue to work closely with the General Counsel, and seek his advice on the legal issues that impact USD(I)'s duties and functions.

Question. The Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. In my previous positions in DOD, I have worked closely with the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and other senior leaders on the Joint Staff, on a range of issues. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I would seek to continue this close relationship to ensure that Defense Intelligence and the Intelligence Community meet the requirements of the Joint Staff and Combatant Commands.

Question. The Commanders of the Combatant Commands, including U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM) and U.S. Cyber Command.

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will support the USD(I) in ensuring that the intelligence needs of the commanders of the combatant commands, including the Commanders of U.S. Special Operations Command and U.S. Cyber Command, are met.

Question. The Directors of the Defense intelligence agencies.

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will assist the USD(I) in his exercise of the Secretary of Defense's authority, direction, and control over the National Security Agency (NSA), the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA), the National Reconnaissance Office (NRO), and the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA). I will also help sustain the excellent relationship that the USD(I) has with the DNI by working with the Office of the DNI to ensure clear and consistent guidance is provided to the Defense intelligence agencies.

Question. The Director of National Intelligence.

Answer. The USD(I) has an excellent relationship with the DNI. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I intend to fully support the USD(I) and the DNI in their mutual goal of greater Intelligence Community integration. Because the USD(I) is dual-hatted as the DNI's Director of Defense Intelligence, if confirmed, I will support the USD(I) as he advises the DNI on Defense Intelligence capabilities.

Question. The Director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will work to sustain the already close relationship that the USD(I) has achieved with the Director and Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and their senior team.

Question. The Director of the National Counterterrorism Center (NCTC).

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will work to sustain the already close relationship between USD(I) and the NCTC.

Question. The Director of the National Counterproliferation Center.

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will work to sustain the relationship with the Director of the NCPC.

Question. The Deputy and Assistant Directors of National Intelligence.

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will fully support the USD(I)'s relationship with the Deputy and Assistant Directors of National Intelligence to ensure integration and unity of effort in the direction and oversight of the Defense Intelligence Enterprise.

Question. Officials in the Department of Homeland Security with intelligence responsibilities.

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will assist the USD(I) as he serves as the Secretary of Defense's focal point for intelligence, counterintelligence, and security matters for senior officials from the Department of Homeland Security (DHS).

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges that will confront the PDUSD(I)?

Answer. If confirmed as the PDUSD(I), the major challenges that are likely to confront me are the continued unprecedented scope and pace of global operations and unmet demand for intelligence in an era of intelligence-driven operations; the need to adapt to a rapidly changing intelligence environment; the need to address longer-term challenges to prevent strategic surprise while fully supporting ongoing operations; and the need to do all this in a more constrained fiscal environment. Additionally, we must improve on protecting intelligence sources and methods and preventing unauthorized disclosure of information. The next PDUSD(I) will have to help the USD(I) overcome these challenges while ensuring Defense Intelligence is postured with the IC to continue to provide world-class intelligence.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If I am confirmed as the PDUSD(I), given the importance of intelligence to ongoing operations, I would do my best to assist the USD(I) in ensuring that sufficient resources are devoted to the Defense Intelligence Enterprise, and that intelligence is shared as widely as possible while also ensuring that it is properly protected. I would also reinforce and seek to effectively implement the USD(I)'s priorities across the Defense Intelligence Enterprise.

Question. What do you anticipate will be the most serious problems in the performance of the functions of the PDUSD(I)?

Answer. The primary near-term challenge to be faced in performing the functions of the USD(I) and, by extension, the PDUSD(I) is preparing for a period of defense budget uncertainty, which will also impact the Defense Intelligence enterprise and the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence.

A second serious challenge that continues to confront the USD(I) and, by extension, the PDUSD(I) is the unauthorized disclosure of classified information, particularly as it relates to the insider threat, and the risks therefore posed to our forces, our military operations, and our foreign relations.

Question. If confirmed, what management actions and timelines would you establish to address these problems?

Answer. If confirmed as the PDUSD(I), I would support Dr. Vickers in managing budget uncertainty as guided by Congress and the Secretary of Defense. I would support the USD(I) in ensuring we continue to provide the best possible intelligence support to current operations, look for opportunities to become more efficient while maintaining and increasing effectiveness, and continue to push to innovate and invest in key capabilities that maintain America's superior technological and operational edge.

In addition, I would support Dr. Vickers' commitment to implementing comprehensive technical, personnel, and administrative solutions to the challenge of unauthorized disclosures, particularly as it relates to the insider threat. I would work with OUSD(I), other DOD leaders and ODNI leadership as appropriate to ensure that the steps taken to correct and mitigate recently exploited vulnerabilities effectively deter and prevent future unauthorized disclosures.

PRIORITIES

Question. How would you anticipate developing priorities for allocating your time as the PDUSD(I)?

Answer. If confirmed, I would develop priorities for allocating my time consistent with Dr. Vickers' priorities. In general, I would anticipate dividing my time broadly between oversight of intelligence operations, the development of intelligence capabilities, and internal management of OUSD(I) operations, and other duties as the Secretary and the USD(I) may assign. In what will continue to be a resource-constrained environment, I will assist the USD(I) in seeking to ensure that resources are strategically allocated to, and across, the Defense Intelligence Enterprise.

Question. If confirmed, what broad priorities would you establish in terms of issues which must be addressed by the PDUSD(I)?

Answer. If confirmed, I would assist Dr. Vickers in continuing to execute what I understand are his overarching priorities, including: (1) ensuring that the full weight of Defense intelligence capabilities are brought to bear to achieve the President's objective of disrupting, dismantling, and defeating al Qaeda, creating and sustaining stability in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq, and supporting other ongoing operations in which the Department is engaged or may be engaged; (2) ensuring that intelligence operations conducted by DOD are effective and in compliance with all relevant statutes, authorities, directives, and policies; (3) ensuring that the Defense Intelligence Enterprise is postured to prevent strategic surprise and fully exploit emerging opportunities; and (4) ensuring that the Defense Intelligence Enterprise is as efficient as possible. As Dr. Vickers has done, I would expect to pay particular attention to ensuring that: we have the right collection and analytical priorities; that we have a robust ISR architecture (both space and airborne), today and in the future; that the Department's clandestine operations are fully integrated with those of the CIA and National Clandestine Service (NCS); that the President's highest priority intelligence programs are fully resourced; that analysis addresses the needs of policy makers and operational commanders; that intelligence is timely, accessible and protected; and, where appropriate, that we aggressively exploit advances in technology to improve our intelligence capabilities.

CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF RISK ASSESSMENT (CRA)

Question. Section 153 of title 10, U.S.C., requires the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff annually provide Congress with "an assessment of the risks associated with the most recent National Military Strategy (or update)."

What is your understanding and assessment of the CRA and the role, if any, of the OUSD(I) staff in supporting or participating in the preparation of this risk assessment?

Answer. The same legislation mandating the CRA also requires the Secretary of Defense to plan for mitigating risks the Chairman identifies as significant. My understanding is that while OUSD(I) does not directly participate in the CRA's development, as the principal staff assistant to the Secretary of Defense for all intelligence matters, USD(I)'s role is to support the Secretary's risk mitigation plan by ensuring the Defense Intelligence Enterprise meets national and Department requirements. USD(I) is also responsible for ensuring it has balanced investments towards delivering the right mix of intelligence capabilities to support the combatant commanders in accomplishing their missions and mitigating the risks identified in the CRA.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of how the CRA is used in DOD's strategic analysis process that informs the National Security Strategy, Quadrennial Defense Review, National Military Strategy, or any other department strategic decisionmaking processes?

Answer. My understanding is that the CRA, a congressionally-mandated report from the Chairman, is used to inform departmental strategic decisionmaking processes by providing the Chairman's assessment of the nature and magnitude of strategic and military risk in executing the missions called for in the National Security Strategy, Quadrennial Defense Review and National Military Strategy. By considering the range of operational, future challenges, force management, and institutional factors, the CRA provides a holistic assessment of the ability of U.S. Armed Forces to meet strategic requirements in the near-term. The Chairman submits the CRA through the Secretary of Defense, who then forwards it to Congress along with his congressionally-mandated annual Risk Mitigation Plan, and additional comments as necessary. The Chairman may also include in the report his recommendations for mitigating risk, such as changes in strategy, development of new operational concepts or capabilities, increases in capacity, or adjustments in force posture or employment.

Question. If confirmed, what changes, if any, would you propose in how OUSD(I) supports the CRA or how it is used to support other strategy decision processes?

Answer. At this time, I do not recommend any specific changes in how OUSD(I) supports the CRA process. However, the CRA may prove useful during the Joint Staff's annual Capability Gap Assessment by underpinning Joint Requirements Oversight Council decisions related to mitigating Combatant Commands' most critical capability gaps. The CRA would be helpful in prioritizing capability gaps and informing Joint Requirements Oversight Council recommendations on where to apply resources or other risk-reduction activities to mitigate the most critical DOD capability gaps. As an advisory member of the Joint Requirements Oversight Council and the DOD Program Executive for the Military Intelligence Program, the USD(I)'s role is to ensure all parts of the intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance architecture are integrated and optimized to meet warfighter needs.

COMBATING TERRORISM

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the Department's comprehensive strategy for combating terrorism, both at home and abroad?

Answer. The President's stated goal to disrupt, dismantle, and defeat al Qaeda and its affiliates is supported by the Department's counterterrorism strategy which focuses first on operational and regional defeat and then strategic and global defeat. Operational defeat of al Qaeda and its affiliates requires conducting operations to render these organizations incapable of planning and conducting attacks, denying them sanctuary and severing relationships to groups providing support to al Qaeda. Strategic defeat could then be achieved by preventing al Qaeda's resurgence.

Achieving both operational and strategic defeat of al Qaeda requires a sustained global counterterrorism campaign with mutually reinforcing direct and indirect lines of operation. Building the capacity of our partners, preventing the acquisition and use of WMD, and countering radicalization is necessary, in addition to conducting operations to directly disrupt and dismantle terrorist groups.

Within areas of hostilities, the Department has a lead role in conducting these activities, along with our international partners. Outside such areas where named operations authorized by the President are being conducted, the Department plays a complementary role to other instruments of national power. Recognizing that al Qaeda and its affiliates remain the most dangerous threat to the United States, my assessment is the Department—in conjunction with the whole of U.S. Government and our international partners—has the correct counterterrorism strategy in place, and it is increasingly more effective.

Question. If confirmed, how would you fulfill your responsibilities related to combating terrorism?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure the Defense Intelligence Enterprise is fully engaged in the Department's counterterrorism strategy and supportive of all efforts to defeat al Qaeda. The goal is to ensure we have the intelligence capabilities we need to achieve the President's counterterrorism objectives, by working closely with Military Departments and Services, the Combat Support Agencies, combatant commanders, the wider Intelligence Community, and our international partners.

Question. How can the Department best structure itself to ensure that all forms of terrorism are effectively confronted?

Answer. Close collaboration among U.S. departments and agencies and with our international partners is essential to our counterterrorism success. One example of this was the establishment of the Joint Interagency Task Forces, which have ensured full interagency contributions to the fight. The Department has developed a close operational partnership with the CIA and the Intelligence Community, and substantially strengthened our international capacity building efforts. I believe these types of actions posture the Department to effectively combat terrorism.

Question. Are there steps the Department should take to better coordinate its efforts to combat terrorism with those of other Federal agencies?

Answer. If confirmed, I would seek to build on and extend these interagency and partner collaborations. These previous efforts have resulted in significant improvements in coordination of operations and interagency concurrence; I would work hard to move the Department and its partners toward further integration of intelligence operations and counterterrorism efforts.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure intelligence activities carried out by Special Operations Forces are adequately coordinated with other activities carried out by those in the Intelligence Community?

Answer. Special Operations Forces coordinate their intelligence activities with the Intelligence Community as required by applicable law, policy, and agreements. My understanding is that SOCOM liaises with members of the Intelligence Community in the Washington, DC, area, at the Headquarters in Tampa, FL, and on the battlefield. If confirmed, I would work to ensure the demonstrable gains achieved in intelligence coordination with the interagency and international partners over the last 12 years are not only sustained, but continue to improve in order to achieve the U.S. Government's counterterrorism goals.

COMBATING PROLIFERATION OF WEAPONS OF MASS DESTRUCTION

Question. What is your assessment and understanding of the Department's strategy for countering the proliferation of WMD, and how that strategy fits into the broader national strategy to counter WMD proliferation?

Answer. Because of my previous experience on the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) staff, I know that the Department's strategy pursues robust counterproliferation policies and capabilities to prevent, deter, defend against, and respond to WMD threats. The DOD strategy supports the National Strategy to Combat WMD and related national strategic guidance through military force planning and doctrine to organize, train, exercise, and equip U.S. Armed Forces to combat WMD, in addition to preparing appropriate plans to address the defense-related aspects of combating WMD.

Question. If confirmed, how would you fulfill your responsibilities related to countering the proliferation of WMD?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the USD(I) to provide guidance and oversight to Defense Intelligence organizations and ensure that the Defense Intelligence organizations respond to the direction and priorities of the Director of National Intelligence, the Secretary of Defense, and DOD components with respect to WMD threats. Furthermore, I will support USD(I) efforts to evaluate the effectiveness of Defense Intelligence capabilities in identifying and assessing WMD threats.

Question. How can the Department best structure itself to support the mission of countering the proliferation of WMD?

Answer. If confirmed, I would continue to make this question a focus, just as I understand it has been for the USD(I). Based on my previous experience on the OSD staff, it is my sense that, consistent with national strategy, the Department has efforts in place to support the mission of countering WMD proliferation in a number of key ways, including interdiction and elimination operations, active and passive defense, consequence management, security cooperation and partner activities, and threat reduction cooperation.

These missions rely on timely and actionable intelligence in a number of areas, including: the state of nations' WMD programs; terrorists' interest in those efforts; existing proliferation networks; national proliferation activities; and the security status of WMD facilities, including possible threats and vulnerabilities.

Question. Are there steps the Department should take to better coordinate its efforts to counter the proliferation of WMD with those of other Federal agencies?

Answer. We must continue robust efforts to counter proliferation of WMD using all available national and international authorities and apply all elements of national power—diplomatic, economic, intelligence, law enforcement, and military. Collaboration and integration among all relevant departments and agencies are key factors for the administration's strategy to combat WMD. Senior level attention can help ensure Federal agencies—as well as other key partners such as at the State and local level and internationally—remain synchronized and focused on the top priorities. If confirmed, I look forward to studying the opportunities for USD(I) to contribute to this important priority.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure intelligence activities carried out by DOD entities and forces are adequately coordinated with other activities carried out by other elements of the Intelligence Community?

Answer. If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I look forward to working with IC partners in global layered defenses to prevent, detect, and respond to the threat or use of WMD by terrorists. We must continue to develop tools and capabilities with IC partners to detect and disrupt the movement of WMD including precursor materials. Because we can never be certain of our ability to prevent or protect against all potential WMD terrorist attacks, collaboration among IC partners to manage and mitigate the consequences of such attacks continues to be necessary, as is improving our capabilities to attribute their source. Thus, continued work is necessary to harness, in an effective multinational way, all relevant collective resources to establish more coordinated and effective capabilities to prevent, protect against, and respond to the global threat of WMD terrorism.

RPA - TITLE 10 VS. TITLE 50 OPERATIONS

Question. According to published reports, U.S. Special Operations Forces (SOF) and the CIA conduct counterterrorism strikes using armed Remotely Piloted Aircraft (RPA). For example, RPA strikes by both U.S. SOF and the CIA have reportedly been conducted in Yemen. Other published reports indicate the Presidential Policy Guidance on Counterterrorism dictates a shift in all lethal RPA operations to DOD.

In your view, what are the advantages and disadvantages from a legal and operational perspective of moving all lethal RPA operations to DOD?

What is your understanding of the milestones that would need to be achieved for such a shift to occur? How long do you believe it will take to achieve these milestones?

Do you expect responsibility for certain geographic areas will transition more rapidly than others? If so, which ones?

Do you expect aircraft and/or personnel will be transferred from the CIA to the operational and tactical control of DOD in the near term as part of this transition?

If confirmed, how would you ensure that lessons learned, including tactics, techniques, and procedures, for the use of armed RPA are captured and transferred to DOD?

In response to a series of questions about counterterrorism operations on Meet the Press, former-Secretary Panetta indicated that "a lot more of this [counterterrorism operations] can be put under title 10" and that "the advantage to it is that it becomes much more transparent in terms of what we're doing."

Do you share former-Secretary Panetta's observation that there has been a limited amount of transparency with respect to title 50 U.S. counterterrorism operations?

Do you believe additional transparency would better enable the United States to push back against claims of civilian casualties resulting from drone strikes?

Answer. With reference to this question set, I am not able to comment in this medium on such activities other than to say that I support the President's policy on the operation of such aircraft, as articulated in his May 23, 2013, speech at the National Defense University and in related Presidential Policy Guidance. I understand the U.S. military has extensive experience in the use of remotely piloted aircraft to conduct intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance, as well as direct action during armed conflict. The appropriate role of DOD in operating remotely piloted aircraft, weighing the advantages and disadvantages, is essentially a policy decision for the President to make. If confirmed, my focus will be to provide the best counsel possible on the intelligence and operational value for such operations and help ensure compliance with applicable policy in conducting such operations. I also look forward to supporting the USD(I) and other senior administration officials in a constructive ongoing dialogue with the committee on this and related issues.

COUNTERTERRORISM COOPERATION

Question. Non-DOD elements of the Intelligence Community (IC) and the military offer unique strengths with regard to intelligence collection against terrorism targets, spanning across the various forms of intelligence (e.g. human and signals intelligence).

What is your understanding of the extent to which the military and non-DOD IC elements collaborate on counterterrorism objectives?

Answer. My understanding is there is extensive collaboration on counterterrorism objectives with the non-DOD IC elements. This is done in several ways: participation in Joint Interagency Task Forces, sharing information on intelligence sources and methods, and exchanging officers at all levels of operations. I believe the Department and non-DOD IC elements should continue to look for opportunities to leverage each other's strengths and improve collaboration.

Question. If confirmed, how would you seek to strengthen this collaboration?

Answer. If confirmed, I will seek, in concert with counterparts at the DNI, to enable better, faster, and deeper sharing of counterterrorism data, while remaining cognizant of the problem we face with respect to risks of unauthorized disclosure of classified information. There has been significant progress in this area that can stand as an example for future efforts. For instance, my understanding is the move to a common, integrated network in Afghanistan—the Afghan Mission Network—and one common database—the Combined Information Data Network Exchange—supports intelligence, military operations, command and control and logistics across all U.S. entities and 46 partner nations. This approach of establishing a common network and common database has allowed us to ensure that all releasable national, tactical and commercially available data from across the DOD and IC is available and discoverable.

Question. What are the major obstacles to achieving greater collaboration?

Answer. Two of the longstanding challenges to integrating the intelligence capabilities of DOD with those of the Department of Homeland Security and other associated Federal, State, and local agencies have been IT system compatibility and effective guidance on sharing classified information. With the issuance of Executive Order 13549, Classified National Security Information Program for State, Local, Tribal, and Private Sector (SLTPS) Entities, we have made significant progress on the latter. The Executive order establishes the right balance between sharing classified information with SLTPS entities in support of homeland defense, while ensuring proper safeguards are in place for protecting information from unauthorized disclosure. If confirmed, I will seek to achieve similar progress against the challenge of IT system compatibility.

CYBER AND INFORMATION OPERATIONS

Question. Information operations, as currently defined by DOD, include electronic warfare, operational security, computer network operations, psychological operations, and military deception. Each of these lines of operations is unique and complex, and, in some cases, they are interwoven.

The establishment of U.S. Cyber Command organizationally separated cyber operations from the other elements making up "information operations." How does this separation complicate integration across these elements, and what is your understanding of the Department's efforts to mitigate its impact?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to studying this question further. My current understanding is that Information Operations as currently defined refers to the integration of various information activities to achieve effects across the information environment, which includes the cyber domain. The establishment of U.S. Cyber Command does not change the relationship of cyberspace operations to the other capabilities necessary for DOD to conduct information and cyber-related operations. It will, however, enhance our ability to conduct information operations in the cyber domain.

Question. The National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (S. 1197) includes a provision (section 941) that would require the Secretary of Defense to designate a Senate-confirmed official within the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy to provide oversight and resource management of U.S. Cyber Command's offensive cyber mission.

What are your views on the roles assigned to USD(I) and the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy with respect to information operations, and particularly offensive computer network operations? If confirmed, what changes, if any, would you consider recommending to the Secretary of Defense and the USD(I)?

Answer. My current understanding is that the information operations policies as outlined in Directive 3600.01 adequately define the roles and responsibilities of both the USD(P) and the USD(I). If confirmed as PDUSD(I), I will endeavor to support the USD(I) in fulfilling these responsibilities and support the efforts of the USD(P) in the execution of all assigned responsibilities under this Directive. Additionally, I will view it as a priority to play an appropriate role in the oversight of offensive computer network operations, now termed offensive cyber effects operations.

Question. The National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (S. 1197) includes a provision (section 901) that would transfer supervision from the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (USDI) to the Chief Information Officer (CIO) of the Information Assurance Directorate (IAD) of the National Security Agency (NSA). This action is recommended because the cybersecurity mission of the NSA IAD falls under the CIO and not the USD(I).

What are your views on the most appropriate oversight of the information assurance and information systems security program by the Office of the Secretary of Defense?

Answer. My understanding is that currently the DOD CIO is responsible for providing policy guidance to the Director, National Security Agency/Chief, Central Security Service, regarding network operations and cybersecurity matters in consultation and coordination with the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence. I believe that this relationship is effective and allows for proper oversight of these functions.

INFORMATION SHARING

Question. There are still strong barriers to sharing, or allowing access to, the mass of raw intelligence data that has not been included in finished reports or analyses and approved for dissemination within the Intelligence Community. Countervailing the objective of sharing more broadly is the need to protect sources and methods and the privacy of U.S. persons.

Despite these barriers, we have also seen recent examples of leaking massive amounts of data by DOD employees and contractors who have been given access to data shared across organizations. Leaking such information has the potential to do serious damage to our national security.

What are your views about whether it is possible to provide greater access to counterterrorism data to analysts and Special Forces while adequately protecting intelligence sources and properly minimizing exposure of U.S. persons' information?

Answer. During my tenure on the OSD staff, I have seen the Department make progress towards increasing access to counterterrorism data for those who demonstrate a need for it, while also recognizing both our responsibility to protect sensitive sources and methods and to respect U.S. civil liberties and privacy laws. Mechanisms continue to be developed to better recognize U.S. person information and minimize the chances of human error. These mechanisms include the development of better policies, improved processes, smart systems, and active oversight by both the Intelligence Community and components of the Defense Intelligence Enterprise. Collectively, these mechanisms can help maximize access while minimizing risk.

Question. How should we achieve the proper balance between sharing of information more broadly and protecting sensitive sources and methods?

Answer. I believe that a careful balance should exist between the need to share intelligence information and protecting sources and methods. I agree with an observation Dr. Vickers has made that the need to share cannot trump the need to know, nor can the fear of protecting sources and methods override the necessity to provide necessary information when it is needed most. Finding the proper balance between sharing information and protecting sources and methods is not a static target; it is, in fact, constantly moving, depending upon specific situations, risks, and urgency. The key to success is recognizing the threshold and circumstances for sharing certain information and making sure others recognize it as well.

Question. What role do you expect to play in addressing this issue if confirmed to be PDUSD(I)?

Answer. If confirmed as the PDUSD(I), I will seek to foster continued policy refinements and refinements in training and capability development to help change behaviors and culture within the DOD enterprise. I will ensure that "need to share" remains in healthy tension with "need to protect". I will continue to drive the DNI's and USD(I)'s "Write for Release" policy by ensuring its tenets are taught at our schoolhouses, incorporated into our systems, and practiced at our analytic centers. I will work closely with our DOD and non-DOD partners to identify best practices and develop new incentives to reward prudent and effective information sharing.

HOMELAND DEFENSE

Question. In your view, what progress has been made in integrating the intelligence capabilities of the DOD with those of the Department of Homeland Security and other associated Federal, State, and local agencies?

Answer. From my experience on the OSD staff, I believe DOD considers itself a valuable partner and enabler to the greater homeland defense effort. DOD works with its partners in the Intelligence Community to ensure relevant intelligence information is shared appropriately with domestic law enforcement and security agencies. Recent initiatives include DOD funded interagency collaboration in the areas of counterterrorism, countering transnational organized crime (CTOC), and maritime domain awareness. DOD also provides domestic agencies with valuable instruction in the detection of improvised explosive devices, conducting terrorism analysis, and mapping cultural terrain. Lastly, DOD fosters interagency integration via the embedding of DOD personnel in other agencies, including the National Counterterrorism Center, FBI Field Intelligence Groups, and FBI joint terrorism task forces.

In addition, DOD has moved forward in formally integrating DOD intelligence capabilities with those of our Federal, State, and local partners. For example, in October, 2012, the Deputy Secretary of Defense designated the USD(I) as the DOD Senior Agency Official to implement Executive Order 13549, Classified National Security Information Program for State, Local, Tribal, and Private Sector Entities (SLTPS). Pursuant to this responsibility, DOD is negotiating a memorandum of understanding with DHS to allow State, Local, and Tribal Fusion Centers to access the Secret Internet Protocol Router Network to support the Fusion Centers' mission of ensuring the safety of the U.S. Homeland.

Question. What challenges lie ahead for achieving better integration?

Answer. I believe that successful integration demands that we promulgate effective guidance for sharing classified information and sustain attention at both leadership and operational levels. The recent publication of Executive Order 13587 "Structural Reforms to Improve the Security of Classified Networks and the Responsible Sharing and Safeguarding of Classified Information" helps enable the sharing of classified information. In addition, the DNI has promulgated guidance that further mandates effective information sharing practices. As architectures and systems connect the Intelligence Community to new partners in national security, ensuring guidance remains current, applicable and fully-coordinated across the U.S. Government will be of continuing importance.

Question. Does the DOD's existing process for setting requirements adequately support the establishment of intelligence requirements for the homeland defense mission?

Answer. My understanding is that DOD's current intelligence requirements process includes the Homeland Defense mission. DOD intelligence requirements continue to compete for finite resources, so ensuring that Homeland Defense priorities are incorporated in Defense intelligence priorities is a challenging, yet worthwhile endeavor. DOD is exploring ways to reconcile these diverse intelligence requirements and is actively working to improve the process.

DEFENSE CLANDESTINE SERVICE

Question. DOD announced an initiative last year to establish a Defense Clandestine Service (DCS) that would be patterned after the National Clandestine Service (NCS).

Do you support the expansion of the DCS? If so, why?

Answer. The implementation of the DCS is an important initiative to improve the operational effectiveness of defense human intelligence (HUMINT) operations and I fully support this initiative. My understanding is the DCS initiative is not an expansion, but a realignment of existing resources, a repositioning and rebalancing of capabilities to improve the Department's collection against our highest priorities. The implementation of the DCS will also incorporate other benefits to the Department by enhancing our strategic partnerships with other Intelligence Community agencies, and by improving the career management and utilization of our clandestine military and civilian collector cadre. If confirmed, I look forward to supporting the USD(I) in a continued dialogue with the oversight committees about achieving our shared goals of enhancing U.S. HUMINT collection in the defense context.

Question. In imagery intelligence, signals intelligence, and overhead reconnaissance, the Intelligence Community operates through a single consolidated agency to meet the needs of national policymakers and DOD. In HUMINT, however, there are two separate organizations funded by the National Intelligence Program budget, one run by the CIA and one managed by DIA.

What is the justification for two organizations in this mission area in a time of severe budget austerity?

Answer. DOD maintains organic HUMINT collection capabilities because it operates under different authorities than the CIA and also responds to different customers, priorities, requirements, and targets. Under title 50, U.S.C., DOD must satisfy the overall intelligence needs of the Department, including the needs of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the combatant commanders. The Secretary of Defense established DCS on 20 April 2012 to provide enhanced collection against high priority national and defense requirements. It is my current understanding that the DCS will operate within existing resources and will complement rather than duplicate the collection activities of the CIA.

Question. Would you be supportive of a pilot program to assess the feasibility, advisability, and cost effectiveness of establishing a military division within the NCS that is responsive to the needs of the Defense Department yet resides within and utilizes the resources of the Central Intelligence Agency?

Answer. If confirmed, one of my key responsibilities in my new position will be to monitor the effectiveness and cost effectiveness of many different DOD intelligence programs, to include the DCS, and to make program adjustments as necessary. It is my current sense, however, that it is premature at this time to consider a pilot program establishing a military division within the CIA. The Department has provided Congress with a 5 year DCS implementation plan that proposes increased operational integration with CIA. I believe at this time that the Department should first be given the opportunity to assess the performance of DCS and efforts towards enhanced integration with IC partners before trying a pilot program. I believe the Department's assessments of DCS performance should be shared with Congress, and if confirmed, I look forward to supporting the USD(I) in a continued dialogue with the oversight committees about achieving our shared goals of enhancing U.S. HUMINT collection in the defense context.

USD(I) ROLE IN INTELLIGENCE PERSONNEL, ACQUISITION, AND POLICY

Question. DOD senior leaders include Under Secretaries responsible for personnel, policy, and acquisition matters, yet the OUSD(I) includes staff with responsibilities for each of these areas as they apply to the intelligence mission.

In your view, should the OUSD(I) staff continue to duplicate the functions and resources of these other Under Secretaries? If so, why?

Answer. In support of the USD(I), I look forward to assessing this in more detail, if confirmed, as the current fiscal environment does require a careful look to ensure inefficiencies and unnecessary duplication are eliminated across headquarters elements. As I have observed from my current and previous capacities on the OSD staff, I have not viewed the OUSD(I) staff functions as duplicative, but instead complementary. The USD(I) focuses on the unique authorities and requirements of the Intelligence Community workforce, managing the Defense Civilian Intelligence Personnel System (DCIPS) under title 10 that is designed to respond to the unique requirements of the Defense Intelligence workforce. For the goals of the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004 (IRTPA) to be realized, the Defense Intelligence personnel system must work in tandem with those of other IC members (the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, etc.)

My understanding also is that OUSD(I) provides advice and assistance to OUSD(AT&L) concerning acquisition programs and processes that significantly affect Defense intelligence, counterintelligence, and security components. Specifically, intelligence analysts with acquisition experience provide acquisition decisionmakers the clearest picture of intelligence capabilities, the cost to address shortfalls, and the risk if the intelligence needs cannot be met. In this climate of ever-changing threats, rapid technological advancement, and reduced resources this cross-functional analysis ensures discovery of cross-enterprise efficiencies. Additionally, OUSD(I) works closely with OUSD(AT&L) and ODNI on programs that are funded by the National Intelligence Program and executed in the Department. This advice and assistance is integral to OUSD(I)'s Military Intelligence Program oversight and Battlespace Awareness Capability Portfolio Management responsibilities.

IMPACT OF SEQUESTRATION

Question. What is your assessment of the impact that sequestration would have on intelligence capabilities to support the combatant commands and the Leadership of the Department if it is sustained in fiscal year 2014?

Answer. In a period of unprecedented fiscal uncertainty, the Department, including its intelligence components, has had a significant challenge over fiscal year 2013 to operate as good stewards in meeting near-term operational requirements. The technical mechanism of sequestration—reducing discretionary spending proportionally across all programs, projects, and activities without regard to their relative impacts on national security—creates systemic waste and inefficiency, significantly impeding the ability to support the intelligence requirements of the Combatant Commands and the Department's leadership. I would urge Congress to pass the President's budget as soon as possible to preserve our critical intelligence capabilities.

Question. What is your assessment of the impact of sequestration on intelligence capabilities to support the combatant commands and the Leadership of the Department if it is sustained for the full duration outlined in the Budget Control Act?

Answer. There is a strong case to be made that the threat environment we are facing in the face of fiscally-driven force structure reductions will require greater investments in intelligence. Others advocate a proportionate reduction to intelligence with force structure. It is premature to predict how the Department will resolve these strategic decisions, but we are on a path to provide an answer with the 2015 budget submission and the 2014 Quadrennial Defense Review.

From an intelligence specific perspective, however, although technology is critical to our Nation's intelligence capabilities, ultimately it is the quality of the intelligence workforce that determines the quality of intelligence support. I am deeply concerned with the impact of long-term fiscal uncertainty on the training, compensation, morale, and retention of the intelligence workforce.

NEED FOR INDEPENDENT INTELLIGENCE ANALYSIS

Question. Intelligence Analysis should be independent and free of political pressure that it reach a certain conclusion, including a conclusion that fits a particular policy preference.

If confirmed, how would you ensure that all intelligence analysts within DOD, including those who may be seconded to offices that are not part of the defense intelligence structure, are free from such pressure?

Answer. If confirmed, I would work with IC leaders to reinforce analytical tradecraft standards as established in Intelligence Community Directive 203 (Analytical Standards), and reaffirm the importance of objective and independent analysis at all levels. There is and should be no tolerance for pressure of any kind on analysts to reach certain conclusions.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you think intelligence officers and analysts should be able to testify to Congress on their professional conclusions regarding a substantive intelligence issue even if those views conflict with administration positions?

Answer. If Congress requires testimony on a substantive intelligence issue, it should be provided, whether or not it conflicts with an administration position.

CONTROL OF INTELLIGENCE AGENCIES WITHIN THE DOD

Question. The IRTPA of 2004 granted the DNI control over the preparation and execution of the National Intelligence Program budget and tasking of national intelligence operations. However, IRTPA also contained language asserting that nothing in the act should be construed so as to impair the authorities of secretaries of cabinet departments, and the Secretary of Defense has delegated "direction, control, and authority"—the highest form of authority in the executive branch—over the national intelligence organizations within DOD to the USD(I).

What are your views on the balance of authorities accorded in IRTPA to the DNI and to cabinet secretaries, particularly the Secretary of Defense?

Answer. In my view, IRTPA struck a proper balance of authorities in that it gave the DNI strong authority over core intelligence functions for the National Intelligence Program, such as setting requirements and budgets, as well as determining priorities for and managing the analysis and dissemination of national intelligence. The Secretary of Defense retains the responsibility for execution of DOD intelligence activities, and has primary responsibility for leadership and management. The Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010 significantly increased the authorities of the DNI regarding leadership and management functions in the IC. DOD and the ODNI staffs have together devoted considerable time and attention to implementing these authorities in a manner that gives full effect to the act while avoiding unnecessary duplication of effort and preserving the Secretary of Defense's ability to execute his statutory responsibilities with respect to DOD's intelligence components.

Question. What are your views on the extent of the grant of "direction, control, and authority" to the USD(I) over DOD national intelligence organizations?

Answer. Statutory provisions in both title 10 and title 50, U.S.C. assign authority, direction, and control to the Secretary of Defense over DIA, NSA, NGA, and NRO as components of the Department, consistent with the statutory authorities of the DNI. In my view, this balance of authorities is appropriate. This is also clearly stated in the current USD(I) charter.

Question. Do you believe that the relationships, authorities, processes, and structures in place between the DOD and the DNI provide sufficient influence for the DOD to ensure that the intelligence capabilities DOD will need in the future to prepare for and conduct military operations will be developed and acquired through the National Intelligence Program?

Answer. Yes. I believe that current relationships, authorities, processes and structures in place between DOD and the DNI have produced highly effective support by NIP resources for military operations.

ANALYTIC CAPABILITIES AND CAPACITY

Question. The DOD Inspector General (IG) recently issued an assessment of DOD long-term intelligence analysis. The assessment concluded that the Department has significant problems in three areas. One is broadly termed "nontraditional support" to the combatant commands in such areas as shaping the environment and deterring potential adversaries, partner engagements, long-term analysis for campaign planning, and evaluation of cyber threats. A second is scientific and technical intelligence support to the acquisition process. A third problem area is lack of in-depth expertise in the analytic workforce.

Do you agree with the IG's assessment? If so, how do you believe the Department can address these problems despite declines in budgets and personnel levels, while sustaining support for counterterrorism and other transnational requirements, and the pivot to the Pacific?

Answer. I am not familiar with this assessment, but if confirmed, I will review it and discuss the IG's observations with Dr. Vickers to ascertain the best way to address the issues raised. In general, I know that the impact of budget and personnel reductions will be factored into the design of these efforts, but I am committed to ensuring that the capabilities of the analytic workforce are systematically and systemically improved. If confirmed I will continue to look for ways to improve effectiveness and efficiency in these areas.

Question. Similarly, the National Commission for the Review of the Research and Development (R&D) Programs of the U.S. Intelligence Community recently concluded that the Intelligence Community makes only a "limited effort" to discern and exploit the strategic research and development intentions and capabilities of our adversaries.

The Director of the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) recently established a new Defense Intelligence Officer for Science and Technology Intelligence. Why was this position established; what is the mission of this office; and how does it relate to the findings of the IG and the National R&D Commission?

Answer. My understanding is the Defense Intelligence Officer for Scientific and Technical Intelligence (DIO S&TI) was established in December 2012 in response to a DIA Director Advisory Board recommendation as well as the DIA Scientific and Technical Intelligence Framework—both of which informed the National Commission for the Review of the Research and Development Programs of the U.S. Intelligence Community. The DIO S&TI is the Defense Counterpart to the National Intelligence Mission Manager for Scientific and Technical Intelligence.

The DIO S&TI is charged with developing the first Defense Intelligence Enterprise Scientific and Technical Intelligence Strategic Intelligence Plan (SIP). The SIP is an advisory document to posture and align, over the next 7 years, DIA, the Combatant Command (CCMD) J2s, and the Military Service Intelligence Centers to discern and exploit the strategic research and development intentions and capabilities of our adversaries. It is designed to reduce the risk of strategic technical surprise and assist program and resource managers with mission prioritization across the General Defense Intelligence Program, DIA Military Intelligence Program, and the Department of Defense Foreign Counterintelligence Program. In addition to the SIP, the DIO S&TI directly supports and partners with USD(AT&L) and ASD(A) to improve scientific and technical intelligence support to the acquisition process.

The DIO S&TI has met with members of the National R&D Commission and is sponsoring a meeting with Commission members and the DIA Director and Deputy Director in October 2013. In discussions with members of the Commission, they indicated their support to the DIO S&TI's efforts regarding the SIP. Specifically, both the Commission members and the Principal Deputy Director of National Intelligence have indicated that the SIP will serve as the roadmap to address foreign strategic research and development and support the identification of areas for U.S. exploitation.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question. What technical challenges does the Intelligence Community face that in your opinion are currently not being addressed adequately by DOD science and technology (S&T) efforts?

Answer. If confirmed, I would continue to address challenges in making the best use of existing and planned sensors in a rapidly changing environment, and then exploiting data coming from those sensors to answer the hard intelligence questions. The Department must continue its significant efforts to protect our critical space systems and data networks from our adversaries.

In my view, however, there are several emerging S&T shortfalls on the horizon that the Department will need to address. The impact of next-generation communications, cryptography, sensors, and computing requires an understanding of adversarial investments and capability developments, as well as whether the Department has the appropriate investment strategy to maintain U.S. capability advantage. The Department needs to better understand the impacts and accelerating rate of change of developing open-source and social media on both offensive and defensive intelligence capabilities and threats. DOD must reinvigorate S&T investments in counterintelligence capabilities to detect and counter the insider threat; identify, track, and counter the cyber activities of Foreign Intelligence Entities; and protect U.S. intelligence personnel from active discovery and targeting.

Question. How should the S&T portfolio contribute to rationalizing intelligence capability as we draw down forces after Iraq and Afghanistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure an appropriate focus on the development of sources, tools and techniques for new and diverse operating environments. Understanding the complexity of intelligence support to small units in distributed operations while working through international partners is important to shaping the environment for campaign planning. Information sharing with nontraditional partners, law enforcement and coalitions provide additional challenges. Finally, there are lessons learned for the IC across the board from counterinsurgency and counterterrorism operations that will need to be reflected in future partnerships.

The S&T portfolio must support the development of novel collection and analysis capabilities tailored to the future operating environment. We must rationalize intelligence sharing policies with nontraditional partners, law enforcement and coalitions, and ensure we deliver intelligence systems that meet those operational requirements. We must also improve our capacity to ingest and process intelligence information provided by such partners for use in our Defense Intelligence Enterprise.

Question. What are your views on the specific missions, concepts of operation, technical viability, and affordability of airships as long-duration, high altitude ISR sensor platforms?

Answer. The Department recognizes persistence as a key development capability for future intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance fleet and continues to advocate for research in the area of stratospheric airships. Theoretically, the potential exists to accomplish multi-year, wide area surveillance, long stand-off distance, airship missions at relatively low operating cost. However, technological and financial hurdles remain before the Department commits to fielding a high altitude airship.

Question. What specific S&T-related efforts should DOD be pursuing to understand the human, social, cultural terrain of adversaries?

Answer. In my time on the OSD staff, I have witnessed the Intelligence Community make significant progress in developing new concepts and methodologies that include social and cultural insight into the operating environment. I believe these concepts and methodologies have proven critical to understanding our national security challenges, and if confirmed, I would support pursuing the necessary science and technology developments to transition these efforts from a labor intensive process today to a more automated process in the future. Advanced automated processing would allow for the automatic ingestion and processing of diverse sources of audio, text, and imagery in order to extract meaning and context from all sources, enabling more rapid and accurate analysis of the human, social, and cultural terrain, enhancing our intelligence capabilities

ROLE OF THE DOD INSPECTOR GENERAL IN SUPERVISING THE DEFENSE INTELLIGENCE AGENCIES' INSPECTORS GENERAL

Question. The Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010 (Public Law 111–259) established the Inspectors General of the DIA, the National Reconnaissance Office (NRO), National Security Agency (NSA), and the National Geospatial Intelligence Agency (NGA) as statutory IGs. The committee has learned that the IG of the NRO has taken the position that the DOD IG has no authority over the NRO IG as a result of this legislation, even for the purpose of establishing DOD-wide IG policy and directives.

What are your views on the relationship between the DOD IG and the IGs of the Defense Intelligence Agencies?

Answer. My understanding is that the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010 amended the Inspector General Act of 1978 to establish the IGs at the Defense Intelligence agencies as statutory IGs and gives them the authority to function independently with respect to the agency they serve. However, the Intelligence Authorization Act did not change the statutory authorities and responsibilities of the DOD IG for the entire department, to include the four Defense Intelligence agencies. Section 8 of the IG Act provides the DOD IG with specific duties and responsibilities relating to its oversight role in DOD. As Defense Agencies, the programs and operations of all four of the Defense Intelligence agencies, to include NRO, fall within those statutory responsibilities. Clearly, all agencies directly concerned and the Department as a whole will benefit from day-to-day cooperation and collaboration between the DOD IG and DIA IGs, and I will certainly encourage a strong relationship among those organizations.

SECURITY CLEARANCE REFORM

Question. The National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 (S. 1197) includes a provision (section 931) that would require the Secretary of Defense and the Director of National Intelligence to reform the personnel security clearance investigation, adjudication, and transfer processes to improve security and reduce costs.

What are your views on the need for improved security, process reform, greater cost transparency, and cost reductions in this area?

Answer. Based on my previous experience on the OSD staff, I know that the USD(I) and the Secretary of Defense have been and remain committed to examining every opportunity to improve security, process reform, greater cost transparency, and cost reductions. If confirmed, I will work in support of the USD(I) with the DNI, who is the Security Executive Agent responsible for developing uniform and consistent policies and procedures to ensure the effective, efficient, and timely completion of investigations and adjudications relating to determinations of eligibility for access to classified information or to hold a sensitive position.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR ANGUS S. KING, JR.

INTELLIGENCE BUDGET

1. Senator KING. Mr. Lettre, the executive branch reported an unclassified combined intelligence budget in fiscal year 2012 of $75.4 billion ($53.9 billion for the National Intelligence Program and $21.5 billion for the Military Intelligence Program (MIP). Please provide your view on how, if confirmed, you plan to work with Under Secretary Vickers to identify duplication and increase efficiency within the intelligence budget while still providing all of the necessary intelligence support required for our national security.

Mr. LETTRE. Senator King, I appreciate the opportunity to address this important topic. Just as the Department's senior leadership is focusing on realigning the overall defense budget, identifying and eliminating duplication and increasing efficiency, we must do the same in the intelligence budgets. As I mentioned in the committee's hearing, I believe current budget times require us to become leaner, to trim overhead, reduce duplication, and shed underperforming activities. It will not be painless or pretty, but we must make tough choices and become stronger and better even as we become smaller.

During this critical period of declining budgets and shifting focus away from combat operations in Afghanistan, we need to ensure we retain today's intelligence advantage and that Defense Intelligence is aligned with future changes to the Department's larger force structure.

If confirmed, I will aggressively support Under Secretary Vickers' efforts to increase Joint interoperability across the Service intelligence systems and integration with the Intelligence Community. These efforts create efficiencies by improving discovery of existing intelligence, prioritizing collection and enabling analysis to operate as an enterprise. For example, Under Secretary Vickers hosts Defense Intelligence Offsites twice a year to address the Department's most critical intelligence issues, including how to make the Department's Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance (ISR) capabilities more effective and efficient.

Further, I will engage fully in the proven processes by which the Office of the Under Secretary for Intelligence (OUSD(I)) identifies duplication and increases efficiency while still providing the necessary intelligence support required for our national security. OUSD(I) currently prioritizes, optimizes and eliminates wasteful redundancy in ISR capabilities via their yearly Battlespace Awareness (BA) Portfolio programming and MIP budgeting processes in order to obtain a collaborative investment strategy with the Services and Defense Agencies. These results are then leveraged through the BA Capability Integration Board (which includes the COCOMs) and the ISR Deputies Council—which, if confirmed, I will chair—to ensure that the budget maximizes efficiencies. Our process culminates yearly when the Under Secretary provides his recommendations to the Secretary on prioritized enhancements and risks for the Department's key ISR capabilities.

In addition to their aggressive engagement in the Department's budget process, OUSD(I) ensures the Departments' intelligence investments are closely synchronized with the investment of the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) and the National Intelligence Program (NIP). If confirmed, I will work closely with the Under Secretary in constructing the joint NIP—MIP Consolidated Intelligence Guidance which coordinates the yearly actions and investments between the two programs. In addition, OUSD(I) participates in the ODNI's Strategic Program Reviews and senior budget review processes, where I will be the representative to the Deputy's Executive Committee. Lastly, I will provide oversight on our joint three-Star forum—the NIP–MIP Integration Group (NMIG)—which is charged with ensuring OUSD(I) and the ODNI are in lock-step on all Department-IC related activities. The NMIG has within the last 24 months finalized NIP–MIP Rules for the Road to help guide resource binning, signed several resource cost share Memoranda of Agreement and helped identify areas where the greater Intelligence Community might reduce duplication and achieve efficiencies.

The Under Secretary of Intelligence is well-positioned to lead changes to Defense Intelligence because it has a leadership role in both the Department of Defense and Intelligence Community resource decision processes. By engaging in these aforementioned processes and forums across both the Department and the greater Intelligence Community, I am confident we can closely manage the budget and our critical investments to reduce duplication and achieve the maximum effectiveness required for national security.

[The nomination of Mr. Marcel J. Lettre II was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on September 24, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on October 31, 2013.]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DUTIES

Question. Subchapter XII of chapter 47 of title 10, U.S.C., establishes the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (USCAAF) and provides for its organization and administrative procedures.
What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the USCAAF and its judges?
Answer. The duty of the judges on the USCAAF is to ensure independent civilian oversight of the military courts. This responsibility is accomplished through appellate review of the decisions of the military courts of criminal appeals. The judges also have the duty of serving on the Code Committee which meets annually for the purpose of making an annual survey of the operations of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ). This committee also is responsible for preparing an annual report that, among other things, provides information about the number and status of pending cases in the military court system.
The function of the USCAAF is to provide independent civilian oversight of the military justice system through appellate review of the decisions of the military courts of criminal appeals. In exercising this responsibility, the USCAAF is responsible for reviewing those cases where a military court of criminal appeals has affirmed a death sentence, where a service Judge Advocate General orders a case to be sent to the USCAAF after it has been reviewed by a military court of criminal appeals, and where, upon petition of the accused and for good cause shown, the USCAAF has granted review of a decision rendered by a military court of criminal appeals.

Question. What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform these duties?

Answer. First, I served as a judge advocate officer in the U.S. Army for 4 years. During that time I not only became familiar with the military justice system by serving as a trial counsel and prosecuting a number of criminal cases, I also became familiar with the men, women, mission, and ethos of the U.S. Armed Forces. I achieved the latter by attending Air Assault school, attending Airborne school, being on "jump status" as a parachutist at Fort Bragg for 4 years, deploying to four foreign countries, and serving in Saudi Arabia (with two very brief forays into Iraq) during the Persian Gulf War and being awarded the Bronze Star.

Second, I served as a Federal prosecutor in the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia. In that capacity I indicted and prosecuted a wide variety of cases in a fast-paced, high-volume office, and I became very familiar with the criminal justice system and the duties and responsibilities of prosecutors.

Third, I was appointed as a member of the Board of Immigration Appeals. In that position I served in a judicial capacity deciding appeals in immigration cases. This professional opportunity enabled me to gain an understanding and appreciation of the role and function of adjudicators at the appellate level.

Fourth, I served as a senior manager within the Department of Justice, and the experiences I had in those positions would help me to run an efficient and productive chambers if I were to have the honor of being confirmed by the Senate.

Fifth, I served for 2 years as the Chief of Staff and Counselor to the Attorney General, which provided me with a broad appreciation of the policy issues that confront any criminal justice system.

Sixth, I currently serve as the Chief of the Department of Justice's Professional Misconduct Review Unit. In collaboration with the attorneys who work for me, I review instances where Federal prosecutors have been accused of misconduct, I determine whether misconduct actually occurred, I write detailed memoranda explaining my reasoning, and then I impose discipline, if appropriate. Serving in this position has reinforced for me the vital importance of performing one's duties consistent with the highest standards of honor, excellence, integrity, and fairness.

Question. Do you believe that there are actions you need to take to enhance your ability to perform the duties of a judge on the USCAAF?

Answer. Being considered for a position that is as important, as challenging, and as consequential as serving as a judge on the USCAAF is a tremendous honor, and I would very willingly take any steps that may be helpful in enhancing my ability to perform those duties. Accordingly, if I have the privilege of being confirmed by the Senate, and even during the confirmation process, I will endeavor to obtain a more in-depth knowledge of the legal issues facing the USCAAF by reviewing and refreshing my memory of the UCMJ, the Rules for Courts-Martial, and the Military Rules of Evidence, and by reading key decisions of the USCAAF and scholarly articles about the military justice system.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. What are the respective roles of each of the following with respect to the military justice system, and if confirmed, what would your relationship be with:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Secretary of Defense is authorized to be a convening authority for general or special courts-martial, and may promulgate orders and regulations that are actionable under the UCMJ. Further, because the Secretary is responsible for the formulation of policy related to matters directly affecting the Department of Defense, working through the Joint Services Committee the Secretary may propose legislative or other changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial and the UCMJ.

However, Article 141 of the UCMJ clearly states that the USCAAF is located in the Department of Defense "for administrative purposes only". Therefore, although it is unlikely that I would have any interaction with the Secretary of Defense even if I were confirmed, if I did so I would treat him or her with the greatest respect and courtesy, but I would always be mindful of the fact that, when it comes to my professional duties and responsibilities, USCAAF judges are wholly independent of the Secretary of Defense.

Question. The Chief Judge of the USCAAF.

Answer. The Chief Judge of the USCAAF is selected based on seniority of commission among those judges on the court who have not previously served in that position. The term of service is 5 years. The Chief Judge presides at court sessions, and oversees the administrative functions of the court. If confirmed, my relationship with the Chief Judge would be both collegial and respectful, but when it comes to decisionmaking in cases, I would fully exercise my independent judgment.

Question. Judges of the CAAF.

Answer. If confirmed, I would expect my relationship with the other judges on the court to be very collegial, and I would closely listen to and consider their points-of-view on all issues that come before the court. However, when it comes to a vote on a petition, a writ, or a case, if confirmed I would exercise my independent judgment in each and every matter.

Question. The military courts of criminal appeals.

Answer. The USCAAF reviews all cases where a military court of criminal appeals has affirmed a death sentence, where a service Judge Advocate General orders the case to be sent to the USCAAF after it has been reviewed by a military court of criminal appeals, and where, upon petition of the accused and for good cause shown, the USCAAF has granted review of a decision rendered by a military court of criminal appeals. If confirmed, I would give full and due consideration to the analysis and reasoning of members of the military courts of criminal appeals in each and every case that comes before me. However, I ultimately would exercise my independent judgment in deciding each case.

Question. The General Counsel of the Department of Defense.

Answer. Although the General Counsel is the chief legal officer of the Department of Defense, Article 141 of the UCMJ states that the USCAAF falls under the Department for administrative purposes only. Thus, the court does not fall under the purview, management, or supervision of the General Counsel. However, the General Counsel does have the authority to exercise those delegated duties as the Secretary may prescribe, and thus coordinates any proposed legislative changes to the UCMJ that the Joint Services Committee may recommend. If confirmed, my relationship with the General Counsel would be respectful and cordial, but I would act independently in my role as a judge.

Question. The Judge Advocates General of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

Answer. The Judge Advocates General of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, and the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, provide advice on military justice matters to the Service Chiefs and to the Commandant, respectively. They are responsible for such actions as supervising the administration of military justice, overseeing the judge advocates and military judges within their service, and reviewing and taking action on certain records of trial. Additionally, a Judge Advocate General may certify questions to the USCAAF, and serves as a member of both the Joint Services Committee and the Code Committee. If confirmed, my relationship with these senior officers would be collegial and respectful, but I would always maintain my judicial independence and neutrality.

LEGAL ISSUES

Question. What do you anticipate would be the most significant legal issues you will be called upon to address if confirmed as a judge of the USCAAF?

Answer. If confirmed, undoubtedly one of the most significant legal issues I would be called upon to address would be the changes to Article 120 of the UCMJ regarding the offense of rape. I also firmly believe that when deciding cases, the judges on the USCAAF must continue to be vigilant about protecting the integrity of the military justice system from the corrosive effects of command influence and ineffective assistance of counsel. Finally, I believe the court will be confronted with issues arising from the use of emerging technology as it pertains to such issues as possession of child pornography and the right of privacy.

JURISDICTION OF THE U.S. COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE ARMED FORCE

Question. In your view, has the USCAAF fulfilled the expectations of Congress when the Court was established in 1951?

Answer. Yes, very much so. Not only has the court provided the necessary civilian oversight of the military justice system, it also has provided independent judicial review in military justice cases and has served as a bulwark against unlawful command influence.

Question. In your view, are there any legislative changes needed regarding the role and responsibilities or the jurisdiction of the USCAAF?

Answer. I am not aware of the need for any changes at this time.

UCMJ JURISDICTION OVER CIVILIANS

Question. Section 552 of the John Warner National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2007 amended the UCMJ to clarify that persons serving with or accompanying an Armed Force in the field are subject to the UCMJ during a contingency operation as well as in a time of declared war.

What challenges, if any, do you anticipate that the armed services and the USCAAF will encounter in implementing the UCMJ with regard to persons serving with or accompanying an Armed Force in the field?

Answer. As with any new law that has not been thoroughly reviewed by the courts, there likely will be a number of challenges to this piece of legislation when and if it is invoked in any additional cases in the future. First and foremost, if it is a United States citizen who is prosecuted pursuant to this provision of the UCMJ, the issue will undoubtedly arise whether its application to a civilian violates a defendant's constitutional guarantees, such as the right to a trial by a jury of one's peers. Second, the CAAF will have to wrestle with determining the scope of the law. For example, issues that may arise in any specific case will likely include determining the definition of such phrases as "serving with or accompanying an Armed Force," "in the field," and "contingency operation." Third, there will be issues about whether the appropriate person within the military command structure exercised jurisdiction in any particular case.

The armed services also will likely encounter challenges when implementing this UCMJ provision. I anticipate that when confronted with a case where this UCMJ provision is potentially applicable, the Armed Services may become concerned about the need to delay taking action until the Department of Justice has reviewed the case to determine whether the Department of Justice will exercise jurisdiction. Further, when a particular case arises, depending upon the circumstances of the alleged offense, the American public may express concerns about the invocation of this provision of the UCMJ and the resulting prosecution of a civilian who is a United States citizen in the military justice system.

DECISIONS OF THE USCAAF

Question. Please describe the three decisions of the USCAAF since 2005 which you believe to have been the most significant.

Answer.

- United States v. Lewis, 63 M.J. 405 (C.A.A.F. 2006). This case reiterates the fact that unlawful command influence is the mortal enemy of military justice and that, where it is found to exist, judicial authorities must take those steps necessary to preserve both the actual fairness, and the apparent fairness, of criminal proceedings.
- United States v. Prather, 69 M.J. 338 (2010). In this case the accused was charged with aggravated sexual assault for engaging in sexual intercourse with a person who was substantially incapacitated. The court held that an accused's burden to prove the affirmative defense of consent by a preponderance of the evidence unconstitutionally shifted the burden onto the defense to disprove an element of the offense.
- United States v. Lee, 66 M.J. 387 (2008). After conviction at court-martial, the accused alleged that his detailed defense counsel failed to adequately disclose a conflict of interest. The USCAAF held that counsel provided to or retained by the accused must provide reasonably effective assistance, and that where a constitutional right to counsel exists, there is a correlative right to representation that is free from conflicts of interest.

Question. What is your view of the role of stare decisis in terms of prior decisions of the USCAAF?

Answer. The doctrine of stare decisis is an essential guiding principle for any appellate court. In the military justice system this doctrine is especially important because it provides both commanders and servicemembers with needed stability, consistency, and predictability regarding the handling of criminal offenses. However, there may be rare instances where applicable precedent should be overturned. This step should only be taken after long and careful consideration, and in those instances when it does occur, I believe the judges of the USCAAF are obligated to explain their rationale for doing so clearly, fully, and persuasively.

Question. In view of Article 36 of the UCMJ, what is your view as to the hierarchy of sources of law that must be applied by the USCAAF in determining appropriate rules of evidence and procedure in courts-martial?

Answer. First and foremost, the USCAAF must ensure that its decisions are consistent with the Constitution. The USCAAF is also bound by the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court. Next, the court should look to the provisions of the UCMJ, other applicable Federal statutes, and its own precedents. Then the court should apply the rules and procedures set forth in the Manual for Courts-Martial. Finally, the court should look to DOD and Service regulations.

Question. In your view, what is the appropriate standard for determining when the USCAAF should apply a rule that is different from the rule generally applied in the trial of criminal cases in the Federal district courts?

Answer. When the Manual for Courts-Martial and the Military Rules of Evidence provide guidance in a particular matter, and when that guidance is not contrary to or inconsistent with the Constitution, binding Supreme Court precedent, or the UCMJ, then those rules are applicable. It is only when the Manual for Courts-Martial or the Military Rules of Evidence are silent on an issue that the court should look to analogous rules applicable in the Federal civilian courts.

MILITARY JUSTICE SYSTEM

Question. In your view, what are the major strengths and weaknesses of the military justice system?

Answer. In my view, the following are the major strengths of the military justice system. First, every accused in the military is entitled to a free, qualified defense counsel at every step of the judicial process. Second, there are sufficient resources devoted to criminal cases in the military so that every case receives the necessary and proper amount of attention. Third, in the military justice system there is no undue pressure for either the Government or the defendant to plea bargain a case. Fourth, the accused's right to be present at, and to participate in, the Article 32 proceeding far exceeds any rights that a similarly-situated defendant would have in the civilian justice system. Fifth, the jurors in the military are uniformly educated, informed, and engaged.

In my view, the two greatest weaknesses of the military system are the potential for command influence to play a role in the ultimate outcome of a criminal case, and the flawed perception among some that the military system doles out "drumhead justice" because of their mistaken belief that the rights of the accused are not adequately protected.

Question. What is your view of the relationship between the rights of service personnel and the disciplinary role of commanders?

Answer. At the core of the UCMJ is the delicate balance that exists between the rights of servicemembers on one hand and the need for commanders to maintain good order and discipline on the other hand. In the military justice context, an effective military force is grounded both on the high morale that is sustained by the knowledge and belief of the average servicemember that he or she will be treated fairly and that his or her rights will be protected, and on the ability of commanders to enforce high standards of behavior in a wide variety of situations, some of which are not analogous to those found in civilian society. In striking this balance, the UCMJ empowers a commander to take such steps as serving as the convening authority and selecting court members, while at the same time providing servicemembers with a variety of rights and with strong protections against command influence. The fact that fundamental changes to the military justice system have been relatively rare over the last 6 decades serves as a testament to the fact that the UCMJ has struck this balance correctly.

Question. Do you think that changes to the military justice system are called for in light of the experiences of the armed services in Iraq and Afghanistan?

Answer. I believe the military justice system has proven itself to be remarkably adept at adjusting to the varied situations arising out of the many operations, missions, and deployments of our Armed Forces during the last decade. Accordingly, I am not currently aware of any changes that are needed in light of the experiences of the Armed Services in Iraq and Afghanistan. However, if confirmed I would always be keenly interested in any recommendations that may be generated by the Joint Services Committee or the Code Committee, as well as any legislative proposals that may be made by, or to, Congress, including the Senate Armed Services Committee.

CAPITAL CASES IN THE ARMED FORCES

Question. The ability of the military justice system to provide qualified personnel and resources necessary to capably defend and prosecute death penalty cases and respond to the constitutional requirements associated with such cases has come under scrutiny.

What is your understanding of the requirements under constitutional precedent for the defense of a capital case?

Answer. In Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984), the Supreme Court established a framework for determining whether the performance of a defense counsel in a capital case was constitutionally adequate. Specifically, Strickland requires the defendant to prove both that the counsel's representation was deficient, and that there is a reasonable probability that, but for the counsel's deficiency, the outcome of the trial would have been different. In later cases the Supreme Court held that failure to conduct a thorough investigation of potential mitigating factors may constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. (See Wiggins v. Smith, 123 S. Ct. 2527 (2003); Porter v. McCollum, 130 S. Ct 447 (2009).)

Question. Based on your review of military jurisprudence regarding death penalty cases since the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Furman v. Georgia, what are the issues or errors that have most frequently resulted in overturning of death sentences on appeal?

Answer. In the vast majority of death penalty cases in the military that have been overturned on appeal, the reason for the reversal has been due to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Question. What do you consider to be the essential elements in preparing court-martial practitioners for the prosecution and defense in capital cases?

Answer. In capital cases it is critically important for both the trial counsel and the defense counsel to be top-notch lawyers of the highest caliber. Next, these lawyers must receive the necessary training in order to ensure that they are fully aware of all the facets of handling a capital case so that they will be informed and effective advocates at each stage of the proceedings. Further, these lawyers must have significant experience litigating cases; training is vitally important, but there is no substitute for hands-on litigation experience in the courtroom when handling a capital case. Next, the lawyers must have ready access to assistance and support in handling certain legal aspects of issues that are unique to capital cases. Lastly, the lawyers on both sides must have adequate time to prepare their cases. Even great lawyers with great training, great experience, and great access to resources cannot perform at a level commensurate with what we must demand in all capital cases unless they have adequate time to analyze and prepare the case.

COMMAND INFLUENCE

Question. The problem of command influence, including instances involving judge advocates as well as commanders, is a constant threat to the military justice system.

What is your view as to the role of the USCAAF in addressing this problem?

Answer. As the USCAAF reiterated in United States v. Lewis, unlawful command influence is the mortal enemy of military justice, and where it is found to exist, judicial authorities must take those steps necessary to preserve both the actual and apparent fairness of criminal proceedings. Accordingly, the USCAAF has been, and must continue to be, vigilant against the corrosive effects of unlawful command influence at every stage of legal proceedings. Further, the court must ensure that all allegations of unlawful command influence are fully litigated at trial and on appeal. Finally, in those cases where unlawful command influence has occurred, the court must take strong, appropriate action to remedy the problem.

PRECEDENT UNDER MILITARY COMMISSIONS ACT

Question. The Military Commissions Act of 2009 (MCA) provides that the judicial construction and application of the UCMJ, while instructive, is "not of its own force binding on military commissions established under this chapter." In addition, the MCA amended Article 39 of the UCMJ to provide that the findings, holdings, interpretations, and other precedents of military commissions "may not form the basis of any holding, decision, or other determination of a court-martial."

What is your understanding of the relationship between the judicial construction of the UCMJ and the judicial construction of the MCA?

Answer. The rules of evidence and procedure in the Manual for Military Commissions (MMC) differ in several important respects from those in the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM). For example, the MMC allows for admission of certain hearsay evidence "not otherwise admissible under the rules of evidence applicable in trial by general courts-martial". The Manual notes that these differences "reflect the [Secretary of Defense's] determinations that departures are required by the unique circumstances" arising out of the conduct of certain military and intelligence operations. However, despite these differences, the procedures for military commissions are generally based on the procedures for trial by general courts-martial under the UCMJ. Nonetheless, as noted above, while the judicial construction and application of the UCMJ are to be considered instructive, they "are not of their own force binding on military commissions." Therefore, the judges within the military commission system are authorized to interpret the MMC provisions that are the same or similar to provisions in the UCMJ in a different manner than they otherwise would be required to interpret them if USCAAF precedential decisions were binding upon them.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. Good morning, everybody.

The committee meets this morning to consider the nominations of Jamie Morin to be Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation (CAPE), Michael Lumpkin to be the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict (ASD(SO/LIC)), and Jo Ann Rooney to be Under Secretary of the Navy.

Before we proceed, we all wish our colleague, Jim Inhofe, well. He is doing well. I spoke to him shortly after his operation. It was quite amazing actually. He sounded in great shape. He was raring to go, and it was not too many hours after his operation. We all look forward to his rejoining us soon. In the meantime, we have our former ranking member with us again. We are delighted that Senator McCain is able to fill in for him.

We welcome our witnesses and their families. We extend our gratitude to the family members who support our nominees through the long hours, the countless demands of their careers in public service. We all recognize the essential role that families play. Without support, our nominees and the people who hold these offices just simply cannot succeed. Our witnesses, during their opening statements, should feel free to introduce family members or others who are here to support them.

We are delighted to welcome Senator John Hoeven. John, there you are. You will be introducing Mr. Morin in a few moments following Senator McCain's remarks.

The positions to which our witnesses have been nominated are some of the most demanding in the Department of Defense (DOD).

The Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation provides independent analytic advice to the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense on issues spanning the entire defense landscape. In some ways this is an unenviable role as a truly independent cost estimating director will never be popular in the Department, but he will make our acquisition system stronger and more precise by forcing the Department to take a hard look at current requirements and highlighting those that are unrealistic.

Mr. Morin, we are pleased to note, is a Michigan native, by the way. We are very proud of you and that qualification alone, as far as I am concerned, would be enough for your confirmation, but you are also well qualified for this undertaking because you have served as Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Financial Management and Comptroller and as the Senior Defense Analyst for the Senate Budget Committee prior to that.

The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict (ASD(SO/LIC)) has one of the most demanding and diverse portfolios in the Department. If confirmed, Mr. Lumpkin will have policy responsibility for DOD efforts in many critical areas, including counterterrorism, counternarcotics, stability operations, building partner capacity, counterthreat finance, and transnational criminal organizations.

Fortunately, Mr. Lumpkin is no stranger to these issues, having served previously as Principal Deputy ASD(SO/LIC), and the committee looks forward to hearing how he would balance the various responsibilities that he would have.

The Under Secretary of the Navy serves as the Deputy and Principal Assistant to the Secretary of the Navy and is responsible for the day-to-day management of the Department. If confirmed, Dr. Rooney will be tasked to lead and manage the Navy's Senior Executive Service and undertake the role of Chief Management Officer for the Navy charged with improving departmental business practices in support of its warfighting mission. This vital management function is made all the more essential by the austere budget environment that we currently face.

Dr. Rooney will surely draw on her experience in the private sector as a former university president and financial attorney, as well as draw on her time as the Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness.

All of our nominees are well-qualified for the positions to which they have been nominated. We look forward to their testimony.

Senator McCain?

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I echo your sentiment and hope for the speedy recovery of Jim Inhofe. He says he feels like an Olympian, and I do not doubt it. We wish him well and hope to have him back here soon, which I am told will be very soon, and we certainly look forward to his continued energetic and informed participation as ranking member of this committee.

I welcome the families and thank Senator Hoeven for his testimony on behalf of Dr. Morin. That may bring his nomination into doubt in my mind. [Laughter.]

If confirmed, these nominees will enter DOD in the midst of great difficulty, caused in large part by the failure of Congress to address budget sequestration or authorize and appropriate in a timely and predictable way, but also by systemic departmental shortcomings which contribute to a "culture of inefficiency" that is robbing warfighters of reliable equipment and absolutely failing the taxpayers.

Mr. Lumpkin, if confirmed as Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict, you will be asked to set policies and practices for our Special Operations Forces. As we draw down conventional forces in Afghanistan, the worldwide demand for special operations remains high. Threats to American interests and international stability persist and grow.

In Syria, Bashar Assad placates the international community with overtures about destroying stocks of chemical weapons, his country fractures, threatening our friends and allies in the region.

Iran's new figurehead, President Hassan Rouhani, has commenced a charm offensive that does nothing to change the fact that the Ayatollah's regime continues to destabilize the Middle East, support terrorist organizations that have killed Americans, espoused the destruction of Israel, oppressed its own people, developed ballistic missiles, and assists Assad in the slaughter of more than 110,000 Syrians.

All the while, our forces continue to distinguish themselves prosecuting operations against terrorists throughout the world.

We as a Government have been, as Secretary Bob Gates articulated so well, utterly unable to predict what future threats we may face and what forces we will need to respond to them. We will look to you to ensure that our asymmetric military capabilities remain strong.

Unfortunately, some of the most serious risks to the institution of DOD and, by extension, our national security are right here in our Government. Congress has provided the Government with precious little certainty about future funding, which has caused untold amounts of scrapped planning, administrative double work, and waste. The sequester, an embodiment of a divestiture of moral courage, has created budgetary instability that is causing well-performing programs to be cut, program officials to be furloughed, and readiness accounts to be plundered, all of which undermine any attempts to properly husband taxpayers' dollars.

In the midst of these across-the-board reductions, Congress and the White House have pushed the Government into a partial shutdown, replete with examples of how we are failing our troops and our constituents.

But DOD's own difficulty in efficiently and effectively managing large programs and business processes have also contributed to the position it finds itself in. After more than a decade of profligate spending and lax internal oversight, senior defense leaders must now impel cultural change throughout the Department regarding procurement practices, financial improvement, and business transformation.

Dr. Rooney, if confirmed, as Under Secretary of the Navy, you will be charged with executing the full scope of the Department of the Navy's business activities, a requirement akin to being the chief operating officer at a Fortune 500 company. You would be responsible for changing a Navy culture that permits inefficient buying of goods and services and management of resources. The Gerald R. Ford aircraft carrier and the Littoral Combat Ship (LCS) are only the most recent examples of programs that have been undertaken without regard for affordability or what our combatant commanders and servicemembers actually need. The Navy faces severe management challenges that require, perhaps more so than ever, world-class skill and judgment of those in management. We are keen to know what about your background qualifies you to manage such an organization at a time when the Navy not only needs established leadership but demonstrated results.

Dr. Morin, in this era of declining budgetary resources, the need for independent, unbiased, and auditable cost assessments of current and future programs is paramount. We simply cannot afford to pour treasure into programs that under-perform, deliver unreliable capability, or for which we are unable to determine lifecycle costs. If confirmed as Director of Cost Assessment and Program

Evaluation, one of your most important functions will be to provide accurate cost and schedule analysis of major defense acquisition programs. This analysis is vital since cost estimates prepared by the Services for major weapons systems have historically proved inaccurate.

You are well aware that this committee created the position you have been nominated to fill, and I believe CAPE has demonstrated some success in driving cost-consciousness into the Services. But as budgets continue to shrink and entrenched interests fight even harder for resources, your job will be more difficult than your predecessors. I look forward to hearing how you attempt to accomplish your charter.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you for convening this hearing. DOD desperately needs strong leadership, and I hope to leave today confident that our witnesses will provide it.

I'd like to submit a statement on behalf of Senator Inhofe.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much, Senator McCain. The statement will be entered into the record.

[The prepared statement of Senator Inhofe follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I join you in welcoming our witnesses today and thank them and their families for their willingness to serve our great Nation.

Mr. Lumpkin, this administration has repeatedly downplayed the threat from al Qaeda and its terrorist affiliates to our national security. Just the other week before the United Nations General Assembly, the President made a statement that I found deeply troubling. He stated that "The world is more stable than it was 5 years ago." I couldn't disagree more. Over the last decade, the number of countries al Qaeda and its affiliates operate from has increased dramatically. Rising chaos throughout the Middle East and Africa is allowing al Qaeda and other terrorist groups to regain their balance and expand their spheres of control. From newfound safe havens, these groups remain determined to plan and launch attacks against the United States and our interests. Despite premature claims by this administration about the demise of al Qaeda and its affiliates, it's increasingly clear that the threat from these groups isn't declining, it's evolving. As such, we must remain vigilant and on the offensive. Underpinning these efforts must be a comprehensive strategy to combat what are increasingly global terrorist networks. We cannot simply kill our way to victory. We must attack their safe havens by empowering regional partners through sustained security assistance and engagement and we must enhance our efforts to disrupt the illicit financial networks that fund their operations. I look forward to hearing your assessment of our current efforts and how you believe we can improve their effectiveness.

Dr. Rooney, if confirmed you will be the second-highest ranking civilian in the Navy and will serve as the Navy's Chief Management Officer. In this capacity, you will be responsible for the overall performance of the Navy's business operations. To be candid, I am concerned by your lack of experience with the Navy and apparent lack of qualifications for this position. I look forward to hearing why you feel you are qualified for this position and the right person to help lead the Navy as it confronts unprecedented budget uncertainty, declining readiness, and mounting strategic instability.

Mr. Morin, if confirmed as the Director of the Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation, you will be responsible for providing the Secretary of Defense with unbiased analysis and cost and schedule assessments for the entire defense program. To date, this program has been plagued by cost overruns and schedule delays, withholding important capabilities from the battlefield. A significant contributing factor to these problems has been a lack of accountability throughout the acquisition process. Without accountability, our ability to provide the best possible equipment for our men and women in uniform on budget and on schedule will be severely undermined. As Director, you will play a vital role in informing the decisions of the acquisition community by conducting upfront risk assessments and feasibility studies to ensure we maximize each of our increasingly scarce acquisition dollars. I believe your time as Comptroller of the Air Force will serve you well in as you take on these challenges.

Again, I thank our nominees for being with the committee today and look forward to their testimony.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Hoeven, we are really delighted to have you here today, and we know that you have the kind of schedule that we all have. We are going to call on you first for your introduction, and then you are free to leave.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN HOEVEN, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA

Senator HOEVEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It is good to be with you, also the former ranking member, Senator McCain.

Like both of you and all of our colleagues, I want to extend my best wishes for a full and speedy recovery to Ranking Member Senator Inhofe. From what I have heard, the doctor said he will have two or three times as much energy as he had before the bypass surgery. That is bad news for his staff. I am telling you right now. [Laughter.]

Chairman LEVIN. As though we did not have enough problems before his surgery.

Senator HOEVEN. Yes, because he went full speed before.

It is an honor to have this opportunity to make a few comments and to introduce and to recommend very strongly to you Dr. Jamie Morin. If I could take a few minutes to do that, I would appreciate it very much.

I am here to strongly support the nomination of Dr. Jamie Morin to be the second Director of CAPE for DOD. I know that you and your staffs know Jamie from his work over the last 4 years as Air Force Comptroller, and before that, you know him from his 6 years working for our friend and former colleague, Senator Kent Conrad, as the senior defense analyst on the Budget Committee. I think it goes without saying that he is very highly regarded in this chamber.

The Director of CAPE—and Senator McCain made, I think, some comments that are absolutely right on the mark in regard to CAPE. But the Director of CAPE is a critical person in the Pentagon. He or she needs to be clearly independent, needs to be a strong analyst, a leader, and above all, needs to be fair. I think that goes exactly to what Senator McCain was talking about in terms of understanding both costs and lifecycle capabilities for our weapons systems.

I have had the pleasure of working with Jamie for almost the entire 10 years he has been working in Washington, including most of my tenure as Governor of North Dakota. Although he has never worked for me, there have been many times that I have relied on his absolutely well-informed and first-rate advice.

Based on my experience, I think he has exactly those attributes that we need in CAPE, attributes like independence, fairness, and skill in leading analysis and, Mr. Chairman, as you have said, at such a critical time for our armed services. Truly we need somebody with his skill and background to provide people with your skill and background with the information that you need to make these important decisions.

He is an excellent match for Secretary Hagel's needs in these very challenging times. His past experiences provide him with the best possible preparation to become the CAPE Director. Based on his experience in Congress, Jamie understands that it is vital for DOD to estimate costs as accurately as possible. The time he spent as Comptroller of the Air Force only reinforces the large fiscal challenges facing the Defense Department and the critical need to make the right choices now to preserve and enhance our armed services for the coming years. That is the perspective we need in a CAPE Director.

As I was thinking through this introduction today, I spoke with Senator Conrad, and he emphasized that Jamie has exceptionally good judgment that will serve him very, very well in this position. In fact, he told me that Jamie developed his great interest in the military as a youngster because he used to sit and read the encyclopedias, something I know that Senator McCain did extensively as well. In reading the entire encyclopedia set, the thing that really grabbed his interest was military power, air power, aviation, military equipment, and that has been a passion of his ever since. Who better, with that kind of interest and passion, to be the leader at CAPE?

From my personal experience, I would note that I have heard over and over from our military leadership about the great work Jamie has done for our Air Force, and I have witnessed it firsthand. He has kept a strategic perspective and a calm head in today's very turbulent times, and I can attest that Jamie has provided excellent, unbiased information and assessment to me whenever I have asked him about Air Force programs.

Not surprisingly, Jamie also hasa very strong academic background, a Ph.D. from Yale, a master's degree in public policy from the London School of Economics, and a bachelor's degree in the foreign service studies from Georgetown.

Outside of Government, he has worked as a strategist, an analyst, and an economist. Our country needs able people to volunteer for public service, and our military needs the support of dedicated civilians like Jamie. I am very glad to see that he has been nominated for this important position, and I am very confident that this committee will see more great contributions from him in the years to come. It is my hope that this committee can act quickly on his nomination and that we can move with similar speed on the Senate floor so that the Defense Department can benefit from his expertise as soon as possible in this very critical time.

One other personal note that I will mention in closing is that I can remember about 8 years ago during the base realignment and closure (BRAC) process, Jamie was extremely involved in that very difficult and arduous process putting together incredible amounts of information not only for Senator Conrad. At that time, I was Governor and we were working with BRAC. It was, needless to say, a difficult, challenging environment, one that required a tremendous amount of information, intelligence, somebody that knew what was going on and could work well with many different people in many different capacities. I would have to say that Dr. Morin went 24/7 for I do not know how long, but at the very same time, his son Liam, who is here today, was born. I think that just reflects on the kind of dedication that this individual has for our country and for our Armed Forces. Isn't that just exactly what we want in the people that work at DOD in these very, very important positions, so important not just for our armed services but for our country?

Thank you so much, Mr. Chairman and Acting Ranking Member Senator McCain. Thank you so much for this opportunity to provide some comments.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Chairman, that might be one of the longest introductions of a witness——[Laughter.]

But I loved every word of it. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Hoeven, your reference to Senator McCain reading the encyclopedia will be placed in the classified portion of this record. [Laughter.]

Thanks so much.

First, we are going to ask our standard questions at this time. I think all three of you know that because of our legislative and oversight responsibilities, we must be confident that we are going to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications and information that are accurate, prompt, straight from the shoulder. when requested by a duly constituted committee or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Dr. MORIN. Yes.

Dr. ROONEY. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much. We will start with Dr. Morin.

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMIE M. MORIN, TO BE DIRECTOR OF COST ASSESSMENT AND PROGRAM EVALUATION, DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Dr. MORIN. Chairman Levin, Senators, it is a delight to come before this committee again today as a nominee of President Obama, in this case for Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation. Thank you for the opportunity to appear before a committee that continues to make a real difference for our Nation and our men and women in uniform.

I, of course, want to join each of you in wishing a very speedy recovery to Ranking Member Inhofe and we all look forward to seeing him back.

It was a real honor to be nominated by the President to be just the second Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation, to have the chance to support Secretary Hagel in these very challenging and interesting times. If this committee and the Senate consent, I will certainly be privileged to serve in that position and to continue the progress that has been made to institutionalize CAPE and to implement the recommendations of the Weapons Systems Acquisition Reform Act that occurred under Christine Fox's leadership as the first director.

CAPE is a remarkable organization really that builds on the history of two incredibly important groups in DOD that have done great work over many years. The systems analysts, who started out life as Secretary McNamara's whiz kids and became the respected and sometimes feared gurus of program analysis and evaluation, have I think been recognized widely as the best analytic team in Government. It would be a privilege to lead them. The hard-core number crunchers in cost assessment are also world-class and sometimes the first in DOD to see problems with our major programs and a crucial check on what can be undue optimism in starting and carrying out our acquisition programs.

I have had the pleasure of working over the last 4 years closely with both of those teams, and again, it is humbling to be asked to be the leader of such an impressive group of dedicated public servants.

I appreciated very much Senator Hoeven's generous introduction, maybe too generous of an introduction. It was a pleasure getting to know him and Senator Conrad during my tenure working for the Budget Committee and, by extension, the great people of the State of North Dakota. I think team North Dakota was always a very tight-knit group, and I appreciate that tight-knit group coming forward to introduce me here. Even as a proud Michigander that never lived in the State, I am honored to have a second State to call my home.

I do think my time observing those two leaders, Senator Hoeven and Senator Conrad, I got to see them in action quite a bit, and despite the fact they did not always agree on specific positions or policies, they managed to get a remarkable amount done for their State and for the Nation. I think that should be an example to all of us about how we can partner to do better to serve this Nation and to serve the men and women who take an oath to defend us and our Constitution.

I wanted to take just one moment to introduce some family members here today, if I may. My wife Megan sitting behind me here has been just a wonderful partner throughout my time in public service. She is making her own distinguished contributions to this Nation. She and my son Liam, sitting next to her, returned just a year ago from a 2-year Foreign Service assignment in Ethiopia.

Chairman LEVIN. Your son we are talking about? A 2-year assignment.

Dr. MORIN. He is a distinguished diplomat. [Laughter.]

He has cocktail party stories, too. [Laughter.]

They did great work there and they did it despite the fact that Meg had to carry a lot of weight without an accompanying spouse. They have put up with my unpredictable schedule both in the Senate and at the Pentagon.

I am also deeply grateful that my parents, Bridget and Michael Morin, were able to come out from Michigan to be with us here today, as well as a number of other family and friends to support me in this hearing, including my brother-in-law, Rick Baker.

Mr. Chairman, I will just close briefly by saying this committee has vested very serious responsibilities in the Director of CAPE. They are going to require first-class analysis. They are going to require very much an independent attitude to the problems that come before me. As a scholar of the defense budget process and now after 4 years in the Pentagon, I know that, if confirmed, my job will be to support the Secretary of Defense in developing a program and a budget in a time of extraordinary uncertainty.

The most helpful thing that could come to DOD right now would be greater certainty and ability to plan. Planning in the face of this level of uncertainty is extraordinarily difficult. But if I am confirmed, you can have confidence that I will continue to provide the top leadership of DOD and this Congress with independent, responsive, analytically rigorous advice on the toughest issues facing our military and our Nation.

Again, my thanks to the President and to Secretary Hagel for their confidence, and I look forward to the committee's questions. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much.

We will now go to Mr. Lumpkin.

STATEMENT OF MR. MICHAEL D. LUMPKIN TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE FOR SPECIAL OPERATIONS AND LOW INTENSITY CONFLICT

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator McCain, members of the committee. It is a privilege to appear before you this morning. I appreciate the opportunity to answer any questions you may have regarding my nomination as Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict.

I wish to thank President Obama, Secretary Hagel, and Under Secretary Miller for their support of my nomination.

I would like to thank my family and friends whose continued support through the years has been essential.

Also, I would be remiss if I did not thank the soldiers, sailors, airmen, marines, and their families with whom I have had the honor to serve during my career in the special operations community. Their selfless commitment to our Nation and to each other is a testament to the strength of our military community and to our Nation. If confirmed, it will be my deepest honor to serve.

The mission of the Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict Secretariat is critical to national defense. Succeeding at the tip of the spear requires intensive training, state-of-the-art equipment, speed, agility, and also important is the decisive so-called soft skills such a problem-solving, relationship-building, and collaboration. I believe my operational and policy background as Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for SO/LIC and as Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense, in conjunction with my career as a U.S. Navy SEAL in both wartime and peace, has prepared me for this nomination. Additionally, my work in the private sector has equipped me with executive level management capabilities that are required to be successful in today's constrained fiscal environment.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with this committee and Congress as a whole to address the national security challenges we face in order to keep America safe, secure, and prosperous. I will make every effort to live up to the confidence that has been placed in me.

I am grateful for your consideration, and I look forward to your questions. Thank you very much.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Mr. Lumpkin.

Dr. Rooney?

STATEMENT OF HON. JO ANN ROONEY, TO BE UNDER SECRETARY OF THE NAVY

Dr. ROONEY. Good morning. Thank you, Chairman Levin, Senator McCain, other members of the committee. I also join in wishing a continued speedy recovery for Senator Inhofe.

I would also like to thank Secretary Mabus and Secretary Hagel for their support, as well as President Obama for the confidence he has shown by placing my name into nomination to be the next Under Secretary of the Navy.

This opportunity is both a privilege and an honor, but it is also very humbling. If confirmed, I will work tirelessly to ensure that I live up to what is an enormous amount of trust that will be placed in me.

I would like to take a moment to recognize some very important people in my life who have traveled from Florida, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania to be with me here this morning. My mom, Patricia Rooney, is with me today and I want to introduce her and offer her my heartfelt and special thank you. It is because of her support and that of my late dad John that I am with you today. My dad, an Army veteran, and my mom, a retired public school elementary teacher, taught me that anything is possible, I must embrace opportunities and challenges, and that I should always strive to leave an organization and the people in it better for my efforts.

I am also so fortunate to have several other special people in my life here today. My dearest friend of over 30 years and sister of the heart, Linda Pitsorni, along with her daughter Veronica, a freshman in college, are here. Veronica, along with her sister Alessia, who is completing a semester abroad and here in spirit, are in so many ways my nieces.

Father Jim Rafferty, a very dear friend and extended family member, is someone with whom I have logged many nautical miles sailing the waters throughout New England and the East Coast.

A retired teacher, John Danes, a retired engineer from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, traveled with mom from Florida to lend their support.

Finally, Ann McGill and Teresa Bacola, also retired public school teachers, have been special friends for many years.

Thank you all for being here.

Particularly in the next few years, the role of Under Secretary of the Navy will require a breadth of experience and perspective to support many key priorities, including the number one asset, our people: sailors, marines, civilians, and their families. We must assure they are supported and we acknowledge their service and sacrifices through our actions; that we maintain operational readiness for today's requirements, as well as those into the future, even in an era of fiscal uncertainty; that the shipbuilding and industrial base are strengthened, supporting a fleet that is affordable and sustainable for the long term; that the acquisition process is efficient, effective, and maintains the highest level of integrity and accountability. Being good stewards of taxpayer dollars is particularly critical given the fiscal realities we face now and into the future.

I have had the privilege of serving under and learning from both Secretary Gates and Secretary Panetta. The experiences from my service in Personnel and Readiness, addressing many difficult issues, as well as the opportunities I have had to work side by side with senior military and civilian leadership in the development of the strategic plan and supporting budgets are invaluable. My work as a university president, business executive, and board member for numerous nonprofit and for-profit organizations, along with my educational background, provide me with the range of experiences and perspectives needed to bring to this role, if confirmed. Along with the dedicated team of men and women in the Department of the Navy, I am confident that this breadth and depth of experience to think strategically, foster innovation, improve effectiveness, enhance accountability, and address changes both in the fiscal and operational environments will support the priorities of people, platforms, power, and partnerships.

My goal, if confirmed, is to ensure that the decisions made and the plans executed over the next few years further support the Navy and Marine Corps for missions now and into the future, retaining our place as the world's most capable and most versatile expeditionary fighting force.

In closing, I would like to thank all the members of the committee for their time and consideration both during this hearing and in our previous conversations. If confirmed, I pledge to work diligently and give my best efforts to serve the men and women and their families who are all part of the Department of the Navy.

I am sure I speak not only for myself but also for many others in extending my appreciation and gratitude to all of our sailors and marines for their selfless service. We are all so very proud of you and cannot thank you and your families enough for all of your sacrifices.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. We are going to start with an 8-minute round this morning. Let me start with you, Secretary Morin, with a question on sequestration.

Tell us what you expect the impact of sequestration and the Secretary's directive to reduce staffing by 20 percent is going to have on the organization and staffing of the Office of the Director of CAPE.

Dr. MORIN. Mr. Chairman, it is very clear to me that the Secretary's direction to make a roughly 20 percent reduction in headquarters budgets to include substantial reductions in all of the human resource sources that we use to do the Department's mission will have an effect on CAPE if we do not do a good job of structuring and managing the organization in order to apply the incredibly talented staff to the top priorities of the Department. As I understand it, the current leadership of CAPE has worked with former Secretary Michael Donely, who was charged by the Deputy Secretary of Defense with leading the Office of the Secretary of Defense staffing review to lay out some options.

I have not been briefed in detail on those options, but I will certainly approach that problem, if confirmed, in the same way that I have approached the need as Assistant Secretary of the Air Force to make some very significant reductions in the size of my own organization there by looking at the business processes we follow and the practices that we use in order to find ways to prioritize and to take out wasted effort. That is hard in a smaller organization like CAPE, but I think we can make it happen.

Chairman LEVIN. We, a few years ago, passed the Weapons Systems Acquisition Reform Act, and I am wondering if you are familiar with it?

Dr. MORIN. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you know whether it has achieved some benefits yet already? It is still fairly young, but can you tell us what your knowledge is about that?

Dr. MORIN. Senator, I have seen enormous progress inside DOD over the last 4 years. I had the privilege of sitting on the Senate floor actually as a number of the debates on the Weapons Systems Acquisition Reform Act were taking part. I was struck when I arrived in DOD by the degree to which the unification of the cost assessment and the program evaluation shops into CAPE had made a difference.

Senator McCain spoke at the outset about the degree to which we need the Military Services to be rigorous about cost estimates, and I have tracked that data, in fact, with regard to the Air Force and have found that over the last 4 years, the range between independent cost estimates out of CAPE and the Air Force service cost positions coming out of the Air Force Cost Analysis Agency have narrowed significantly. It is a limited number of observations, so you cannot do a lot of great statistics——

Chairman LEVIN. I think it would be helpful, when you get there, that you write that up for us because we are interested in tracking what the impacts of our legislation have been.

Dr. MORIN. Absolutely.

Chairman LEVIN. Let me ask you, Mr. Lumpkin, about the authorization for the use of military force (AUMF), the 2001 authorization, and whether you believe that the current legal authorities, including that AUMF enabled the Department to carry out counterterrorism operations and activities at the level that you believe is necessary and appropriate.

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Department's position is that the AUMF meets the needs to be able to do what needs to be done in the ongoing counterterrorism efforts.

Chairman LEVIN. Is your position the same or is it different or do you not have a position?

Mr. LUMPKIN. No, no. I agree with it.

Chairman LEVIN. Now, do you share the views of Secretary Panetta and Central Intelligence Agency Director John Brennan that many of the counterterrorism operations conducted by the United States today could better be carried out under title 10 Department of Defense authorities?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I think that title 10 is the preferred way to do things when we can, and I think we should strive to make title 10 the principal method of conducting these operations.

Chairman LEVIN. Now, earlier this year, the office of ASD(SO/LIC) completed a report on authorities used by the special operations forces to engage with partner nation security forces and said, among other things, that, "The existing patchwork of authorities taken together is inflexible and incoherent." Do you believe that there are gaps in the current engagement authorities?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Mr. Chairman, I think there are probably some gaps in seams, and if confirmed, I would look to identify what those would be and to work with this committee in order to rectify that.

Chairman LEVIN. All right. Would you do that promptly, please, when you are confirmed?

Mr. LUMPKIN. If confirmed, yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Let me ask you now, Dr. Rooney. What does your understanding of the impact that the shutdown is having on the Department of the Navy, including the morale of military, civilians, and contractors serving there with the department?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir. The impact has been significant in all areas, and let me break that down a little bit more. In terms of the military and the readiness and, frankly, the morale, it is the uncertainty of the ability to have repair work done and the work done to support them, the programs that support the families, which impacts the readiness directly. That uncertainty, along with the cost, is a concern there.

The civilian workforce. Particularly on top of the budget uncertainties, the known caps and furloughs that have occurred, we are starting to lose some of the most senior people in the Department and also we know that there have been continuing challenges to staff up in the areas of experienced acquisition people, program managers, medical personnel, and that will continue to be exacerbated.

In terms of the contractor workforce, any work stoppages or anything that would slow down the production will go right to that industrial base and jeopardize our ability to keep those contractors engaged and keep those people employed and moving to conclusion of the program.

Frankly, it is across all three levels, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Now, Dr. Rooney, your experience as President of Mount Ida College and Spalding University and your experience as the Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness and Acting Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness give you a unique experience on the issue of sexual assaults involving young women and young men in the military, as well as in colleges and in universities. Does the military have an advantage over colleges and universities in preventing and responding to sexual assaults?

Dr. ROONEY. You are correct, sir, and I share everyone's concern that sexual assault in the military and elsewhere in the colleges and universities is a significant issue.

The advantage, if you can call it that, that the military has is several-fold.

One, the ability to get data across the Services is an opportunity that is unique. Colleges and universities do not have that ability to look across every college and university and gather that data in a central area. There is the ability to get good information going in.

Also, there is a different structure of command and control and oversight that commanders have in military installations that, frankly, university presidents, deans of students, and others do not have.

However, I think on the other hand, there are lessons to learned from both. I think that while the military is in a position to get good information, influence through our command structure, there is the opportunity to look out to especially colleges and universities and see what they have done in the area of alcohol and substance abuse programs, which we know are critical factors that often are tied to issues of sexual assaults. What programs have worked in those settings to educate students, to develop bystander programs, and all of these, the military has already incorporated in terms of training programs and bystander awareness. But I think that ongoing awareness, frankly, can help both sides really go after a problem that is very, very significant.

Chairman LEVIN. Just to conclude, you made reference to the commander. Does the role of the commander give the military and should it give the military a special capability of dealing with sexual assaults?

Dr. ROONEY. It should for a number of reasons. The commander has a number of tools that they can use not just judicial but also non-judicial type of punishment and tools. The commander is also very responsible and must be held accountable for the command climate, what is actually going on, what are the attitudes and the behaviors of the people around him or her in command. Yes, in fact it does create a significant tool and ability to influence.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much.

Senator McCain?

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

In other words, Dr. Rooney, do you support the commander's role in disposing of Uniform Code of Military Justice violations, including the case of sexual assault?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, I believe the commanders do need to be in that chain, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. In your response to written committee questions, you said you did not have enough information to say whether the Navy will meet its legal obligation to meet the financial audit deadlines for 2014 and 2017. What is your opinion today?

Dr. ROONEY. I still, sir, do not at this point have the detailed information. I know that they have a number——

Senator MCCAIN. Until you find out, then I will not be supporting your nomination. I want an answer whether the Navy can meet its legal obligations. If you do not know the answer, then you are not qualified for the job yet.

[The information referred to follows:]

Dr. ROONEY. Based on the Department's currently favorable risk assessment of the remaining efforts, today I am cautiously optimistic that the Navy will achieve the fiscal year 2014 mandate.A brief summary Department of the Navy's progress toward achieving audit readiness on its Statement of Budgetary Activity (SBA) by the end of fiscal year 2014:

- The Marine Corps' portion of this statement has been under audit for several annual cycles, and has made great strides towards obtaining a favorable opinion.
- In addition to the Marine Corps effort, the Navy has asserted audit readiness on seven SBA-related business areas. These areas include: E–2D Advanced Hawkeye Major Defense Acquisition Program (MDAP), Appropriations Received, Civilian Pay, Transportation of People (TOP), Reimbursable Work Orders (RWO), Military Pay, and Fund Balance with Treasury (FBWT).Of these seven, four (E–2D MDAP, Appropriations Received, Civilian Pay, TOP) received favorable opinions after independent examinations were completed on them.
- Exams on two more of these SBA-related areas (RWO, Military Pay) are currently underway, and the Navy expects the third examination (FBWT) to commence soon.
- Three remaining business areas (Contract/Vendor Pay, Requisitioning, and Financial Statement Compilation/Reporting) comprising the SBA are on schedule to be asserted in fiscal year 2014.

Senator MCCAIN. Dr. Rooney, last month, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) provided an analysis of the personnel strength, and the GAO said the Navy, "could not provide how many civilians it has as of July 2013 because, according to Navy officials, there is a problem with its information system." We are telling the taxpayers we do not even know how many civilian employees we have?

Dr. ROONEY. Sir, I am familiar with that GAO report, but data I have seen and even the input that the Navy has had into the contractor analysis has been significant, and I have not seen a direct evidence of their inability to count. But if confirmed, I would clearly make sure that that system is in place because the human resource and being able to understand not only our civilians but our contractors is critical.

Senator MCCAIN. I think our taxpayers ought to at least know how many employees the Department of the Navy has.

The LCS. The GAO recently criticized the program as being over budget, behind schedule, deficient in proven capabilities needed by the warfighter. The report concluded—and I quote from the GAO—"The apparent disconnect between the LCS acquisition strategy and the needs of the end users suggested that a pause is needed." Do you agree with that conclusion?

Dr. ROONEY. Sir, I am familiar with the recommendations. I think that the LCS had several mission-driven platforms to it. I know there has been some controversy in it. But I am also aware that every Chief of Naval Operations (CNO) since Admiral Vernon Clark have supported the program because it provides the capability that they need, and chief among that is forward presence. However, I also share the concern that the acquisition must be based on very stringent requirements going forward.

Senator MCCAIN. I hope you will answer the question, and that is, do you believe a pause is needed as recommended by the GAO?

Dr. ROONEY. The concern with a pause at that point was any gains that have now been achieved, particularly in the production with the unit cost—and at this point, that cost curve since the GAO report has continued to go down, but if that program is slowed down, those efficiencies in the building will also suffer and again those costs will go up.

Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Lumpkin, your response to a request from this committee for an assessment of al Qaeda was, "As the President said, the remaining operatives in al Qaeda—we now confront a less capable but still lethal threat from geographically diversified groups affiliated with al Qaeda." Do you stand by that statement? "Less capable"?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I do in the sense of the core al Qaeda in itself.

Senator MCCAIN. I am not asking about core al Qaeda. I have heard that dodge a number of times. Do you believe that al Qaeda is more capable or less capable today than they were 5 years ago, whether it is the core or not? I am talking about al Qaeda.

Mr. LUMPKIN. I would argue less capable to attack the Homeland directly, but U.S. interests—it still has the capability to hit U.S. interests abroad.

Senator MCCAIN. Al Qaeda is gathering strength in the ungoverned regions of northern and eastern Syria. The Washington Post reports that fewer than 1,000 Syrian rebels have been trained. Do you think the training cited by the Washington Post is capable of altering any balance of power in Syria?

Mr. LUMPKIN. As it sits right now, I do not see a significant balance changing based on that.

Senator MCCAIN. Do you believe that the surge was a success in Iraq?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I do believe the surge was successful in Iraq.

Senator MCCAIN. Did you support it at the time?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I did.

Senator MCCAIN. On al Qaeda again, is it true that al Qaeda in Iraq has now grown into a larger organization called the Islamic State of Iraq and al Sham or ISIS, which now enjoys a safe haven in the area encompassing parts of Iraq and Syria?

Mr. LUMPKIN. That is my understanding, yes, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. They operate active terrorist training camps in Iraq and Syria?

Mr. LUMPKIN. That is my understanding.

Senator MCCAIN. Is it correct that the ISIS senior leaders are believed to be in Syria?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I do not have an answer to that one, to be honest with you, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. Do you believe that situation might have been different if we had left behind a residual force in Iraq than it is today?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I think the preference would have been to have a residual force, absolutely. As we look as an exit strategy in Afghanistan, the benefit of a residual force is absolutely there.

Senator MCCAIN. That is not coming along very well in Afghanistan.

Mr. LUMPKIN. There are challenges, yes, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. Do you think maybe Mr. Karzai is looking at what happened in Iraq and what is happening in Syria and what is happening all over the Middle East and maybe drawing the appropriate lessons from that?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Senator, I cannot speculate to what President Karzai is thinking or his motivation.

Senator MCCAIN. I see.

You do believe, though, that we should leave a residual force behind in Afghanistan?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I do.

Senator MCCAIN. Do you have an estimate of the size of that force that should be left behind?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I do not. I would have to do some analysis, and candidly, Senator, I have not dug into that. If confirmed, I would be happy to look at that with the rest of the Department.

Senator MCCAIN. Maybe you can look at it before you are confirmed.

[The information referred to follows:]

Mr. LUMPKIN. Our core goal—to defeat al Qaeda and prevent its return to Afghanistan and Pakistan—remains unchanged. Over the past 4 years, due to the dedication and sacrifices of our forces, our coalition partners, and the Afghan security forces, I have been encouraged by the progress made toward our goal and believe this progress can continue beyond 2014.

The executive branch is reviewing options for the size of our contribution to the post-2014 North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) mission, as well as a limited U.S. counterterrorism mission, and that decision will be based on a number of factors, including:

- Conclusion of a U.S.-Afghan Bilateral Security Agreement and the NATO Status of Forces Agreement;
- Progress toward our core goal of disrupting, dismantling, and defeating al Qaeda and preventing its return to Afghanistan and Pakistan;
- Continued progress and development of the Afghan National Security Force;
- A peaceful Afghan political transition centered on the elections in April 2014;
- The potential for peace talks between the Afghan Government and the Taliban.

If confirmed, one of my priorities would be to confer with our operational commanders to get their views of the situation at hand. I would then work with colleagues to provide my recommendations and participate in this review process to help senior leaders continue to make informed decisions that protects U.S. interests in Afghanistan and the region.

Senator MCCAIN. I have no more questions, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator McCain.

Senator Reed?

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Dr. Rooney, could you talk about the issue of readiness in the Navy and your perspective as you prepare to assume these responsibilities?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir. I believe Admiral Greenert is certainly on the record as saying that there is definite concern of readiness among the Navy at this point and, particularly under the current budget and uncertainty of the budget, some risks going forward to the overall readiness. That remains a concern. Being able to get equipment repaired on time and be able to get people deployed on those ships is a concern if it slows down, the training. Training budgets have been greatly affected, and frankly at this point, we are sacrificing potentially some long-term readiness in order to meet short-term needs, and that is a grave concern to everyone in the Department.

Senator REED. Another issue that you will have to face in your particular responsibilities, in your managerial responsibilities is the shipbuilding program which is related to readiness, obviously, but has a longer term typically. With respect to shipbuilding, any comments on the decisions you might have to make going forward, given the budget constraints?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir, and it is not only the budget constraints, but it is also based on some of the historical facts and the cost challenges and issues that I know this committee has looked at and other committees have looked at and raised a concern. It points to the necessity for any of our shipbuilding programs to make sure that we have the appropriate requirements initially, that we are engaging industry earlier on in the process so that we get better cost estimates and better cost controls. We build in a process to make sure that what is being built is meeting requirements so that, more importantly, those requirements continue to meet the needs outlined by the warfighters.

Senator REED. One of the issues that Senator McCain brought up and I think very correctly as the ranking member of the Seapower Subcommittee is the Ford carrier program, the significant cost increases on the first ship to be built and additional cost added in as complications arose. We are on the point of negotiating a second ship.

Can you comment specifically about—and that might be just emblematic of the overall challenges, as he alluded to of managing better the resources you have. Given a $580-plus billion budget, most Americans believe there are ways through management that some money can be saved. That is not the silver bullet, but I think one of the major things you are going to have to do is manage better the resources you have, whatever they are.

Dr. ROONEY. I agree, Senator, and if confirmed, will certainly do that and definitely build on the lessons from the past, particularly in that case of what was learned from that first one before any second contract or actually construction on a CVN–79 is started.

Senator REED. Dr. Morin, recently the Pentagon Inspector General (IG) released a report on the F–35 and the construction particularly in the Lockheed Martin facility at Fort Worth suggesting that the attention to detail necessary and just the dedication to the task was not only inadequate but it was costing the program millions of dollars in avoidable costs. The company indicated that information might be out of date, that changes have been made. But one of your key challenges will be not just this program but many other programs. But can you comment on that report? You had quite a bit of interest, I think, on the Budget Committee also.

Dr. MORIN. Yes, sir. I have looked at the Inspector General's report in brief, although I have not seen the detailed analysis of the contractor and the program office's response to it yet. Based on my reading of that report, though, it appears that the ISO–9001 quality control processes 2–3 years ago were deficient. I understand, based on the program office's response and DOD's response to the Inspector General's analysis, that a great deal of actions have been taken to close those specific deficiencies and that the program office is using the report as a tool to identify the continued deficiencies that need to be closed out, which is exactly what I would expect them to be doing. I view IG and GAO reports as a tool for the public to have visibility but also a tool for the management of the Department to identify problems and rectify them.

Senator REED. There are many different ways you have deal with the issue, and it goes to some of the questions I raised with Dr. Rooney.

But two are having contracts in which the contractor has skin in the game, as well as the Government—and I think we are moving that way from a cost-plus to cost-share—and also provisions in the contract where there are, indeed, penalties if good practice is not adhered to.

The other aspect is having the people who monitor these contracts, DOD personnel or contractors, but hopefully DOD personnel, who really on a day-to-day basis are there with their feet on the ground making sure that everyone is working hard.

Do you have any comments on those two dimensions?

Dr. MORIN. Absolutely, Senator. I will start by noting just given recent experience that furloughing all of those personnel does not contribute to a mission accomplishment, and that it is unfortunate that we were in that position. It will set back numerous programs.

There has been a great deal of effort over the last 4 years by both Under Secretary Hale and former Under Secretary, now Deputy Secretary Carter and Under Secretary Kendall in working their two respective parts of the acquisition process, contract audit and contract management, to ensure that we are providing better incentives and that we are holding people to account. Those workforces have grown as part of the acquisition improvement efforts, although, of course, with the Department-wide reductions in staffing, a lot of planned growth is now not going to occur.

But I have seen what I think is real improvement in the Department's acquisition performance over the last 4 years, some of which is clearly attributable to the Weapons Systems Acquisition Reform Act and some of which I believe is attributable to an aggressive management effort. But it is clear there is much more work to be done.

Senator REED. Thank you.

Mr. Lumpkin, first, thank you for your dedicated service in the U.S. Navy to the Nation.

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you.

Senator REED. Thank you very much.

U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM) is scheduled to increase its force structure of about 65,000 to 71,000 because of the enhanced missions and, indeed, the worldwide global missions that you are going to undertake. Do you see any obstacles to achieving that force level and maintaining the extraordinary quality of the force?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you, Senator. Actually I do. One of our challenges, of course, is the Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR) in 2006. What it did is basically scoped the size of the operational force, and it saw a glide slope of growth. The QDR 2010 showed that there are enabling requirements of those forces of intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance and things to support the force. Sequester is putting some of those gains the program of the QDRs in jeopardy to achieve the growth of the force the way we had originally programmed in those two QDRs.

Senator REED. Thank you very much.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Reed.

Senator Ayotte?

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank all of you for being here today.

Dr. Rooney, I want to congratulate you on your nomination for this position. You and I have had a chance to meet previously when you came to New Hampshire and was able to learn about our deployment cycle support program and what we are doing in New Hampshire to help those who are returning from the war and particularly our Guard and Reserve members who go back to a civilian type setting. I wanted to get your impression of whether that is a program that, given your new position, you would take some of those experiences as a model of what we might be able to do in other States.

Dr. ROONEY. Senator, thank you. The short answer on that is yes for a number of reasons. First of all, it is critical that the programs that we put in place and whether those are personnel programs or acquisition programs, that we have some accountability and measures and we use those things that are working. Anytime that there is a working model that we can show has effective results, that is not only good for the individuals but, frankly, it gets us to the point of use of resources. We have to be very critical when we have programs in place that we cannot have outcomes. To use the models such as the one there—and I thank you for that time in New Hampshire.

Senator AYOTTE. I thank you.

Dr. ROONEY. I learned a great deal, and it is exactly that type of thing. If confirmed, one of the key areas that I will spend time on is looking even outside of the Department to the industries. I have worked in the financial industry, health care, education—and see if there are some models for both people, as well as acquisitions, that we could use those best practices.

Senator AYOTTE. Great.

Also now in the position that you are nominated for, one of the important roles you have in the Navy is maintaining our attack submarine fleet. Of course, the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard plays a key role as one of our four public shipyards in doing that.

Senator Shaheen and I, who both serve on the committee, obviously feel very strongly about particularly the workforce at the shipyard, the skills they have, the apprenticeship program we have in place. I am very worried about the impact that the furloughs have had on the civilian workforce, and obviously the uncertainty because of the Government shutdown. I look forward to working with you to maintain that tremendous workforce.

I am going to invite you to come to New Hampshire again, on behalf of Senator Shaheen and I, to come to the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard to see the excellent work. Oh, I forgot Senator King. How could I forget Senator King? It is technically in Maine. [Laughter.]

Yes. Most importantly, I see Senator King here, and I know how much pride he takes in the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard, too. We would love to have you come up—jointly the three of us on the committee and I am sure Senator Collins would as well with the years spent on this committee—to our shipyard. That is the invitation that I am extending in your new role to come to New Hampshire again and then see the work that is being done here by a very talented workforce.

Dr. ROONEY. Thank you, Senator. If confirmed, I will certainly take all of you up on that and do share personally, but also I know the Department shares the concern about losing the key civilians, losing the expertise. It is not easy then, if you do lose it, to try to gain that back. In the period of uncertainty we are now, that remains a very, very critical, critical concern going forward.

Senator AYOTTE. Great. Thank you, Dr. Rooney.

Mr. Lumpkin, let me just say thank you so much for your distinguished service to our country.

I want to commend the Special Forces and the Intelligence Community and the administration for the recent capture of al-Libi. That was tremendous work, obviously important raids that were recently done in Somalia and Libya. How important is the capture of someone like al-Libi with regard to our fight against al Qaeda? Is he a pretty significant player?

Mr. LUMPKIN. He is, and we will know more as the intelligence is gathered after his capture and we will find out how significant he really was and has been.

Senator AYOTTE. We certainly know that he has had prior associations with Osama bin Laden and also with al Zawahiri. Is that right?

Mr. LUMPKIN. That is my understanding, yes.

Senator AYOTTE. In terms of the intelligence gathering, how important is it that we have the opportunity to gather intelligence from someone like al-Libi to find out what knowledge he has about al Qaeda and obviously any of the associates or members of al Qaeda?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I think it is absolutely crucial. Whenever we can capture somebody of that stature, the intelligence we can and will gain is significant that can lead to future operations that ultimately save American lives.

Senator AYOTTE. Let's assume we do not know, obviously, what this individual knows, but given his, as I understand it, decades of involvement in al Qaeda, that it is important in terms of the interrogation. Do you think that we should put a timeline on that interrogation?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I am always hesitant on timelines.

Senator AYOTTE. Why is that?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Because as things flow, you do not know necessarily what you are going to get and you do not want to be up against a clock. Candidly, in my current capacity at the Department, I was not involved in the planning or have not been debriefed on the operations that happened over the past weekend. On these particular operations, I can provide no granularity or fidelity. I am sorry.

Senator AYOTTE. But in terms of a timeline, you would agree with me that it is best to take as much time as you need to interrogate someone that may have valuable information to shed light on al Qaeda and perhaps prevent future attacks.

Mr. LUMPKIN. From an operational standpoint, that is the preferred methodology, yes.

Senator AYOTTE. I thank you very much, and I appreciate the question that Senator Reed asked about the impact on SOCOM of sequester. Obviously, I think the role of SOCOM has become even more important. I look forward to working with you in your new position.

I would also like to ask Secretary Morin where are we on the audit with regard to the Air Force and how do you see us meeting those timelines for a statement of budgetary resources and then moving forward from there?

Dr. MORIN. Senator, the Air Force is continuing to press forward aggressively on the 2014 and 2017 audit readiness timelines. Candidly we lost progress last year due to a 6-month contract protest that took our independent public accountant (IPA) advisors out of work. So that was unfortunately timed, and we have resolved it now. We have a contract awarded and IPAs, public accountants, on site helping us with certain tasks.

We have made some continued progress in identifying the actions we need to take in the near term with our existing legacy information technology (IT) systems, our legacy financial systems in order to give ourselves the best chance at meeting that 2014 deadline. As I have testified to this committee and subcommittees before, that is not a sustainable long-term approach, and we will not have our objective future financial systems fully fielded by the 2014 deadline. There is some risk in the 2014 deadline. Pressing aggressively on the 2014 deadline for the budgetary resources, though, has helped us significantly reduce the risk on that 2017 deadline for full audit readiness.

Senator AYOTTE. I know my time is up, but would you agree with me that this is a very important thing for us to get done?

Dr. MORIN. Absolutely. It has been certainly a core focus area of mine over the last 4 years and the Department as a whole. Secretary Panetta, during his tenure, put just enormous attention on this issue based, in part, on the feedback he received from members of this committee about how crucial it was. We saw really significant progress that is now continuing under Secretary Hagel's leadership. The American taxpayer has a right to expect that the Department will be good stewards of the taxpayer resources, that we will get the most combat capability out of each dollar. Part of giving them that confidence is getting to audit readiness and getting to that clean audit opinion. It is an enormous enterprise and it is a challenging undertaking, but it is crucial.

Senator AYOTTE. I want to thank all of you. I appreciate it.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Nelson?

Senator NELSON. First of all, thanks to all of you for your public service.

Dr. Rooney, please pay attention as you look at the issue of sexual assault, that it is not just an issue for DOD with regard to the military, but also in the contractors. This Senator had found, back during the Iraq War, quite a few examples of sexual assault among contractors of where nothing was done. The most recent examples we have seen in the actual Active Duty military personnel, but there were a number of issues when I chaired a hearing on this back in the Iraq War where it was completely swept under the rug with regard to contractors.

Now, I think we, as a result of that, got the U.S. attorneys sensitized to this so that they would start their investigations and prosecutions. But since the contractors were basically overseen by DOD, this problem surfaced first there and then we see it later in all of the discussion. Please keep that in mind.

Mr. Lumpkin, the attention rightly is being given to the Special Operations Forces, as it should be, as we meet the new threat of a new type of enemy. What is the relationship that you will have in your position as a civilian in DOD with our Special Operations Forces and Admiral McRaven in the SOCOM?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you, Senator.

The relationship between the ASD(SO/LIC) and the Commander of SOCOM—it is a civilian oversight and it is a Service Secretary-like relationship, and this is overseeing the operations and budgetary and acquisition programs within SOCOM.

Senator NELSON. That is pretty key, and of course, it is going to be these kind of raids that we are going to hear in the future as we are meeting this new kind of enemy and we have to find them. Of necessity, that is going to be the special operations working with their counterparts in some of the civilian agencies.

Mr. LUMPKIN. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Nelson.

Senator Blumenthal?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I thank each of you for your service in both civilian and military roles and your willingness and your families' willingness to take on this new responsibility.

Let me begin, Dr. Morin—by the way, I understand your wife is a native of Connecticut which, for me as for the chairman, is more than ample reason to support your confirmation.

Chairman LEVIN. You have two votes so far. [Laughter.]

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, I would vote to confirm your wife, not you necessarily. [Laughter.]

I want to thank her for her service in Ethiopia as well.

I am sure you are familiar with the M–17 helicopters that the U.S. taxpayers are funding to buy from Russia. Rosoboronexport is selling those helicopters to Afghanistan for purchases with U.S. funds. DOD, evidently, is continuing with the policy of making use of the exception that we made in the last National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for the purchase of those helicopters. I strongly disagree that those purchases should continue. I think they should stop. The Afghans cannot use them because they do not have people trained to fly them or to maintain them, and if we buy helicopters for the Afghanistan Army, they should be U.S. helicopters.

Could you give me an update on the review, and would you agree and can you commit that you will undertake a review of those purchases before they are made?

Dr. MORIN. Senator, if I am confirmed in the position, I will certainly look forward to working with my teammates in the acquisition enterprise and the policy community that have come to the judgments about that program so far to ensure you get full answers to any questions on it.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I would like to press you a little bit. I would like to know that you will undertake a review of those purchases and come back to the committee and to me with your view as to whether or not they are, in fact, justified under that national security exception.

Dr. MORIN. Sir, I can personally take a look at it. I think the legal judgments on the national security exception are not typically made in the cost assessment and program evaluation sphere, but I am happy to make a commitment to you to look at it. I will be, of course, relying on others in the Department with the specific expertise on the policies, though.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Dr. Rooney, I have been informed that as of this morning, Naval Superintendent Vice Admiral Mike Miller has referred for general court martial two of the three midshipmen who have been potentially charged with sexual assault or other improper activities in connection with the alleged wrongdoing involving Midshipman Bush, the assault on her that has been alleged.

I am sure you are familiar with the process that took place, the Article 32 proceeding. As a lawyer and also as someone who knows the military system, would you agree with me that the current Article 32 procedures really need complete revision and change?

Dr. ROONEY. Sir, I would definitely agree with you that the Article 32 process needs significant revision in regards to the issues for two reasons, both in terms of ensuring that we do not discourage future reports or future victims to come forward and also to ensure that we maintain that balance between both the victim and accused and also the necessary privacy in these matters. I absolutely agree that Article 32 does need to be reformed.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I strongly support an alternative to the current command structure, complete responsibility for the charging process. I believe it ought to be taken out of the command structure and that it ought to be the responsibility of a separate trained, experienced prosecutorial office, which is contrary to the view that you have expressed here. I respect that view, and obviously it has substantial support from other members of this committee. The proposal I support has been advanced by Senator Gillibrand.

But is the problem with the current Article 32 process not reflective of some of the deficiencies and weaknesses in the current system more fundamentally as a whole?

Dr. ROONEY. Sir, I would think that the Article 32 by itself is something that can be reformed very quickly.

In terms of the overall process, I am aware that there has been a panel convened to look at independently this entire process. I would look forward to seeing what they saw in terms of that process, any weaknesses that they identified, as well as any strengths, and based on that, then make a very informed decision going forward and ensure that as we correct the system and as we create greater support and attack this problem quite bluntly that we are doing it in a manner that we are aware of all of the implications and ramifications. I remain open and really would look forward, if confirmed, to that panel report and working with this committee to really solve this problem.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Working with the committee to solve the problem in terms of considering additional measures besides the Article 32 reform and perhaps besides the revisions that have been suggested so far by the committee in the NDAA?

Dr. ROONEY. Absolutely. I think what we need to do is definitely be open to look at what does work, as I mentioned to Senator Ayotte, to really step back and see what types of measures can we put in place and how can we assure that what is changed—that we are able to track that and make sure we are getting the results that we need, that there is the accountability in there. As a result, yes, I would definitely be willing to work with this committee, if confirmed, and find a solution.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I welcome your willingness to work with the committee and your openness to additional ideas. I think the more the public understands about the differences between the civilian and the military system and the more we understand, the more support there will be for ending the kind of really abusive and intolerable questioning that took place in the Article 32 proceeding involving this midshipman case and probably countless other cases where victims of sexual assaults, survivors are subject to this kind of interrogation without counsel, without support, and without advocacy. I hope that you will take a very active interest in the sexual assault problem and in encouraging and emboldening additional reporting, which is necessary for the kind of data, the full and complete and accurate data, that you suggested is very important in these cases.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My time has expired.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Blumenthal.

Senator Donnelly?

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

To all of you, thank you for your service to the country, and to the families, thank you for coming up here today and being with your loved one.

Mr. Lumpkin, in your questions that we had asked you and information that you had given us, you talked about SOCOM's ability to conduct rapid evaluations of technology and the emerging off-the-shelf technologies as well.

Being from Indiana, I wanted to invite you. In Dr. Rooney's continuing travel log going to New Hampshire and Maine—we talked about you going to Indiana as well to see Crane Naval Warfare Center. Mr. Lumpkin, I think that would be a great spot for you to come by to see. The work that is done there is the very cutting-edge technology work that SOCOM uses for much of the operations. I just wanted to invite you to come by and see the place where much of what our fighting force will be using is made, is put together, and for you to be able to sit down and tell them what else you might need.

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you, Senator. In my previous assignment within SO/LIC, when I was the Principal Deputy, I did have a chance to visit Crane and to see the amazing work that is being done there on behalf of the special operations community. You have my commitment, if confirmed, that I will make a trip out to Crane in short order.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you very much.

Dr. Rooney, this year's NDAA will require DOD to provide a report outlining the effectiveness of computer-based testing in the identification of individuals at risk of suicide. We lost more Active Duty young men and women to suicide than in combat last year. You have great academic experience. We would value your input into this report, and I ask that in the role as Under Secretary of the Navy, that you keep an open mind to recommendations as to how to turn this around, how to put this in a better place, how to have each of our service men and women come home safe at the end of their service.

Dr. ROONEY. Sir, if confirmed, I would definitely pledge to do that. As you said, it is a problem for which there is no single solution, but it is one that we have to continue to work and find better ways, obviously, to support our men and women because those numbers are not acceptable.

Senator DONNELLY. Doctor, you saw or I presume you saw the series of articles in the papers here regarding the pretrial testimony of the young midshipman and the incident there. What it brings to mind is who would ever report sexual assault again, to follow up on my colleague, Senator Blumenthal? Who would ever report that that happened to them if they knew that kind of treatment awaited them by making that report and trying to protect their dignity?

Dr. ROONEY. Sir, you absolutely hit upon the reason why my response was, if confirmed—but I know the Department is already looking at it—how to in a very short order, reform at least Article 32 so that we do not do exactly what you are suggesting, which is discourage other people from coming forward. The only way that this issue will be changed, we will be able to attack this issue, the climate will be changed is in fact people come forward, they feel comfortable coming forward, they are protected coming forward, and we are able to continue to successfully prosecute and hold people accountable for it. That is a critical aspect of solving this issue.

Senator DONNELLY. We have taken an extraordinary interest in this because it is an extraordinary problem. One of my colleagues in past hearings mentioned that if they had a daughter, they would not recommend to them at this time that they go into the Service. I cannot think of a more damning indictment than that. We are going to make this right, work nonstop to make this right. I know we have your commitment, if you are confirmed, to make sure that that happens as well. There have to be significant changes made because for that young man or woman—it could be either—to undergo hours and hours, whether it was 23, 24, or 25, 30, without their own counsel, without their ability to be treated with a certain dignity, something is very wrong with the way the process is handled now.

Dr. ROONEY. I agree, Senator, and I will reiterate my pledge, if confirmed, to work tirelessly on this issue, but also work directly with this committee and others, so together we are able to move forward and address the many issues surrounding this.

Senator DONNELLY. Secretary Morin, the Active versus Reserve makeup that we have, the CAPE report, similar things. I had mentioned to you in a meeting we had about how they tried to close down the A–10 base in Fort Wayne, IN. At a time when they were delivering the same services that could be delivered by Active Duty, the Reserve was doing it at 28 cents on the dollar. We have to look to ways to fund our military better, to lessen the pain of sequestration, but we also have to save money where we can and where it makes sense.

I want your commitment that you are going to take a look at this and try to make decisions not based on this group or that group but where the numbers fall, where it is right for our Nation, and where it is right for our fighting force moving forward that there be no protection of one group or the other in this process, but that we make the decisions that make the most sense.

Dr. MORIN. Senator, you have that commitment from me. This is exactly the sort of issue where independent, unbiased, rigorous analysis is critical. The specific cost factors associated with any particular force element depend on a number of assumptions about how you are going to use it, when you are going to use it, and how intensely you will use it. But it is clear, as the Department grapples with significant reductions in our top line budget, that we need to optimize across the total force.

Senator DONNELLY. Primarily for Dr. Rooney and yourself but, Mr. Lumpkin, if you would like to chime in on this too. I am getting a little short on time.

I met recently with some Navy folks who said that within a certain number of years looking forward, two-thirds of the funds that go to the Navy every year for operations would be for personnel costs, health costs, similar things. In effect, what you have is a health and personnel plan with a couple of ships in the water as well. How do we change that destiny?

Dr. ROONEY. The numbers you cite, based on information that I have seen, are accurate, that the personnel costs are quickly escalating to the point where they are not sustainable because they are, in fact, taking away not only from short-term but long-term investments. It comes down to making sure that we are understanding what is driving those costs and having the difficult decisions based, as you indicated, on analysis, on facts, and on an understanding of where we can make adjustments in those budgets so that we can have sustainability and having those very difficult conversations.

I had seen that information when I was in Personnel and Readiness. It was something that we were tracking very, very closely. While our people are our number one asset, it cannot be at the expense of a balance in terms of total force and the necessary equipment.

We would have to very closely look at it and, frankly, be very open and honest and work with this committee and having those discussions about where those levers are that we can actually pull and understanding what the ramifications are not only in just one budget cycle year, but quite frankly going forward.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you. I am out of time.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

With the understanding, I hope, of my colleagues, just on the Article 32 to embellish just for one moment. Would you agree, Dr. Rooney, that we have to look at Article 32 in addition to the sexual assault victim who is put through a wringer on Article 32, but that it is broader than that in terms of the way Article 32 is used in general? Would you agree with that?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir, I absolutely would. If I implied differently——

Chairman LEVIN. No, no. You did not. You did not imply anything at all. I just think it is important, while we were on that subject, anyway, I think it clarifies it.

Senator Kaine is next.

Senator KAINE. I have two general questions that I would like to ask, and maybe with Dr. Rooney to begin, if you could each respond.

The first deals with planning. My service on the committee, though brief, has made me more and more aware that good planning is at the core of so much of our military success, whether it is planning about a battlefield operation or a special operation or planning about a weapons system acquisition. I am increasingly disturbed about the budgetary uncertainty and how that messes up planning in each of your corners of the world and how it takes the planning expertise, and instead of having that expertise devoted toward proactive missions and responsibilities, the planning expertise kind of gets diverted toward, we do not know what the budget will be and so we have to run all these scenarios because of the uncertainty of the budget operation.

I would just like you to each talk about how you see the budgetary uncertainty, sequester, shutdown, et cetera affecting planning functions in your current capacities.

Dr. ROONEY. Sir, I will speak to, if confirmed, the issues that I am aware of that Navy would face, and they are several-fold.

Senator McCain had asked if I felt that I could state emphatically whether in fact Navy would have audit readiness by 2014, and I said I did not have the information to make that determination. Part of that is because with the inability to make sure that there is the appropriate hiring to fill those slots—and those have been difficult to fill—as you indicated, with the uncertainty in budgets and how to make last-minute adjustments and not be working towards a strategy but frankly moving towards a budget role, moving people off of the planning, that has exacerbated that issue.

In order to do good planning, you have to start with a good base whether that is understanding your inventory, whether that is understanding your people. As we continue with not only the fiscal uncertainty but also the uncertainty with our people and being able to allow them that opportunity to sit back and think on a time horizon that is longer term with certainty, we are going to continue to have an ever-increasing problem with planning, not a decreasing problem.

Dr. MORIN. Senator, I would just add that one of the key reasons that our DOD is the envy of the world and our military establishment is the envy of the world is the really robust planning, programming, budgeting, and execution process that we use. I have been approached in my job as Air Force Comptroller by senior officials from other nations, ministries of defense, saying we would love if you would have people come over and educate us as to how the Air Force, how DOD does this long-range plan.

The Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation organization is the keeper of what is called the Future Years Defense Plan, the database of the programmatic decisions that the Department is making for that 5-year time horizon. I can tell you very directly that the rigor and intelligence that needs to be put into making those choices sensibly is enormously demanding. The process of simultaneously doing that sort of planning at multiple budget levels, while you do not know what your previous year's jumping off point is—so right now, we are in the midst of 2015 to 2019 planning horizon with absolutely no idea what we are going to be doing in 2014, if and when we end the shutdown and get to start executing 2014—that is enormously difficult. I think the instability really puts at risk that entire well-articulated, effective set of institutions that strive to squeeze that maximum amount of combat capability out of each taxpayer dollar. It is doing enormous and untold damage to the institution.

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you for the question, Senator, because I think this one is absolutely key, especially with regard to the special operations community. Special operations cannot be massed produced. It is not one of those things that you can just turn it on and off like a light switch. It takes time and there is a significant process that goes into making a special operator who tends to be more seasoned, older, more experienced than what we see in the general purpose forces.

The plans that we had developed in QDR 2006, which I had mentioned earlier, about growing the force and then those enablers that were identified in the 2010 QDR—we are just now seeing a lot of those operationally hit into our units that we can deploy and use in the future. To shrink and scale that back, there is what we call the "flash to bang". There is a delay to get those people on the front lines. If we retract from where we are at right now, it takes a long time to turn it back on. The uncertainty causes significant problems with force management and overall readiness as we go into the future, especially in these uncertain times.

Senator KAINE. Let me just extend the discussion. I want to talk about morale of your people. Last week I was asked and I was honored to be asked to give someone the oath of office for a promotion in the Air Force from major to colonel. It was an exciting thing, but it happened 2 days after the individual had been furloughed from his job as a DOD civilian. He was an Air Force veteran C–17 pilot but now working as a civilian in the Pentagon. He gave a couple of comments with friends and family gathered around on a day that should have been a day of just unalloyed pride and happiness. It kind of had a worm in the apple there because of the furlough.

He said something that really kind of struck everybody. He said we hear a lot of talk about American exceptionalism. I was furloughed earlier this year because I am serving my country, and there was a sequester, and I have just been furloughed a second time because I am serving my country and there is a shutdown. I am not feeling that we are that exceptional right now. It really struck me as there has to be significant morale effects of all this uncertainty, wondering whether the political leadership is behind you or not. That has to have a short-term morale effect and a long-term as well. Do I want to stay and do this? Do I want to keep making the sacrifice?

Again, maybe starting with Mr. Lumpkin and working back across, if you would each explain how you see this affecting the folks that you are working with.

Mr. LUMPKIN. I will talk on two different fronts with regard to morale. Within the special operations community—we will talk about that first—we have some highly energetic men and women who want to do great. They want to serve this Nation. When they see the uncertainty of the future, they are wondering. I cannot speak for everybody, but there is apprehension about what does the future hold and what is my perceived value.

Now, if you look in the civilian workforce, which I am surrounded by at the Pentagon as well now, the furloughs took their toll on morale. The shutdown has even been greater. The certainty of what is ahead is not there, of where is this going to end and what is it going to look like in the future and where do they fit in. I have real concerns about the morale of both our Armed Forces and the Federal workers based on the current climate.

Senator KAINE. Mr. Chairman, my time has expired, but could the other two witnesses briefly respond?

Chairman LEVIN. Sure, please.

Senator KAINE. Thank you.

Dr. MORIN. Senator Kaine, the impacts have been very serious. I spent a couple hours yesterday walking through and talking with members of the really impressive staff that supports me in my current job as Air Force Comptroller, a staff that makes me look good and makes the Air Force very effective and efficient. It is a group I rely on enormously, about two-thirds civilian and a third military.

Both parts of that community are under enormous strain. What we have asked the military folks to do in a time of successions of civilian furloughs and the uncertainty we have asked our civilians to take on is heartbreaking, and it is deeply disruptive. People are holding together well and they are pulling together as a team. I saw that now that a large portion of our workforce has been recalled, and there were actually people in the office. But it has been one blow after another, and we are asking a lot of our mid-level supervisors to keep their teams focused in the face of all of that.

Again, it is very hard to quantify the effect that it will have. I am sure we will see more retirements of highly valued performers. We have seen that across the Air Force already. I am sure we will see people seeking greener pastures. The American public needs dedicated public servants willing to come into Government and put up with some of the unique challenges working there for the purpose of the mission. If we keep giving them this level of uncertainty, this level of personal pain, we may lose them, and we will not know that damage until we have seen it and we will deeply regret it then.

Senator KAINE. Dr. Rooney?

Dr. ROONEY. Sir, it is interesting. I bring a slightly different perspective than my two colleagues because I have been out of the Department for just over a year. Looking at the difference between when I left the Department where people were working tirelessly long hours, but as Secretary Morin said, some of the best people that make all the senior leadership look good, to go back now and see the angst, the uncertainty, key people discussing that they think it is time to be able to move on because the uncertainty is affecting them not only in the work arena but home has been absolutely heartbreaking to see. These are critical people.

If I could just look at the Navy, of the roughly 200,000 civilians in the Department of the Navy, over half of those people are engineers, acquisition specialists, scientists, technology. Over 50 percent are veterans. I have heard the same thing. Retired colonels, who would be exactly the kind of people you want on your team, saying I would go to private industry because I just cannot face that uncertainty, really creates not only the problem now, but it is a problem that I do not think we even will see the results of for years to come, and at that point it is going to be virtually impossible recover.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Kaine.

Now a 100 percent Mainer, Senator King.

Senator KING. I could say that New Hampshire is technically a State, but I would not say that. [Laughter.]

Especially not with Senator Ayotte here.

I want to associate myself with Senator Kaine's questions. I am infuriated that we are in this situation. We are now seeing the fruits of—I do not know—25 or 30 years of disparaging Government employment, bureaucrats, and that kind of talk.

Senator Levin and I went to the Middle East this summer, and people have asked me about my reaction to that trip. There are lots of policy reactions, but the most overwhelming reaction that I have told my friends of that trip was the amazing quality of the young people that we have working for this country, whether it is in the Intelligence Community, the military, or the State Department. They are wonderful people who are idealistic and trying to serve their country, and we are treating them shabbily. These are people who have not had a raise in 3 years. They have been furloughed. They have now been furloughed again.

It is beyond my comprehension why we are not doing better on solving the problems. I mean, the most serious threat to national security right now is the U.S. Congress, and it is shocking that we cannot do this. I understand maybe some are talking about something and we may postpone these deadlines for another month or so, but that we cannot do better by our people is terrible. I think part of it is this public repeating of this disparagement of public servants, and it includes teachers, by the way, I mean, some of our most important public servants. It is shameful.

I am sorry. That is not a question because you have all answered the question.

I do, Dr. Rooney, want to follow up. As I understand it, one of the big problems with the projection of costs, which is moving toward two-thirds being personnel, is health care costs. Is that in fact the case?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir, it absolutely is.

Senator KING. That points up the fact that—and there are two ways to deal with those health care costs. One is for the Government to shift those costs to somebody else. I believe the more important role that we have is to try to figure out how to lower those costs for everyone, not just for the Government or for Social Security or for Medicare, but for the entire society.

I am worried about the shipbuilding program. We have a 30-year shipbuilding plan supposedly to go to 306 ships, but we are not going to make it during much of that 30 years. If we do not replace sequestration and get this budget situation in order, is that not going to be one of the casualties?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir, absolutely. In fact, I think the CNO came in front of this group or Members of Congress and started to outline the immediate impacts of shipbuilding that would be extended, useful lives of equipment hopefully being extended, early decommissioning of potential ships because it just comes down to an affordability and choices. Again, any of these impacts that we are talking about have, of course, a short-term impact, but I do not think we are taking the time to recognize the long-term implications of that not only for the immediate readiness of our forces and our ability to defend around the world, but also from the industrial base and the shipbuilding skills necessary to move it forward. He was very clear, I believe, in outlining that.

Senator KING. In the State of Maine, we have two naval facilities, the Brunswick Naval Shipyard and a civilian facility in the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard. I can tell you once those welders go somewhere else, you cannot get them back. That is not something that you can turn off and on. It is a capacity that we are losing, and people are going to look back in 10 years—Congress is very good at making problems and then looking back 10 years later or 5 years later and blaming other people for creating the problems.

We are going to look back and say what happened, why did we not have a ship available to go to the Gulf or whatever it was.

Mr. Lumpkin, to change the subject rather dramatically, I think September 11 was the first battle of World War III, and I think we are in a fundamentally different military situation and you are right in the middle of it. The question I want to ask—and it is a question I asked the day before yesterday in the Intelligence Committee—is how do we rethink our strategy for dealing with worldwide terrorism which seems to be spreading and multiplying. We now have groups we never heard of a few years ago, al Shabaab and al Nusra and these other groups associated with al Qaeda. The strategy of trying to kill these people one at a time is like dealing with the Hydra. You cut off one head and two grow back.

Talk to me about a broader strategy for dealing with worldwide terrorism because it is going to be with us, and I just do not know if we are going to be able to afford to or will be able to effectively cut it off by strikes and raids.

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you, sir.

I think you are absolutely correct. We are not going to be able to kill our way to victory in the sense of one at a time and getting one "eaches" work forward. I think the key is, through building partner capacity, we need to reduce areas where there are security vacuums for groups like al Qaeda or al Shabaab to exist and to flourish. I think the key for us, as we build our strategy moving forward, is to make sure we focus on those security reforms that we can help in other nations through building partner capacity to remove the environment that fosters such behaviors that al Qaeda has. If confirmed, I will do my part to shape that strategy.

Senator KING. The implication of what you just said—part of that leads logically to Afghanistan and 10 or 12 years of occupation in order to do that. I hope you are not suggesting we need to occupy Somalia, Mali, Lebanon, you name it.

Mr. LUMPKIN. No, I am not. I am not advocating nation building in a sense. I am talking about building a capacity with selected partners who can bring security to where there are security vacuums. This is not a one-size-fits-all. Rather, it has to be a tailored approach based on the specific region and/or country in question.

If you look at the in securities we had in Colombia back in the 1980s and 1990s, it has been a concerted, sustained effort. But I would argue that we have made significant progress with Colombians as partners to make that a much more stable and vibrant economy and allowed more of a secure situation for the populace and the people of that area, subsequently reducing the flow of narcotics and creating stability within the region.

Senator KING. One of the answers would be to study that situation and figure out how to replicate it.

Mr. LUMPKIN. I think it is a good case study to look at.

Senator KING. Dr. Morin, you are in an incredible job because I hate to tell you this, but I do not think there is going to be a lot more money. Nobody is going to wake up tomorrow morning and say, gee, I want to pay more taxes so we can spend more money. I hope the sequester is not going to stay with us, but certainly limits are going to stay with us. You have to be rigorously objective, it seems to me. You are in one of the most important jobs in DOD in my view because you are going to be dealing with constrained resources from the day you walk through the door.

Dr. MORIN. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. There was not a question there.

But I think acquisition costs—the taxpayers just are not going to tolerate it. You did not have the pleasure of Senator McCain, I do not think, talking to you about the F–35, but you probably will before it is all over and it is not going to be fun, I can tell you.

Thank you very much. Thanks to all of you for your service.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator King.

Senator Hagan?

Senator HAGAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I echo Senator King's comments and that is, we thank all of you for your service. Thank you very much for your past service and your current.

Mr. Lumpkin, I want to build on Senator Nelson's question. Title 10 states that the principal duty of the ASD(SO/LIC) is the overall supervision, including oversight of policy and resources of our special operations activities. In other words, the ASD(SO/LIC) is to provide civilian oversight of acquisition, budget, and related matters for SOCOM. In recent years, these responsibilities have competed with current operations for the main attention of the ASD(SO/LIC).

If confirmed, will you make oversight of SOCOM a top priority?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you, Senator.

Absolutely. Being in SO/LIC when budgets were increasing, the opportunity presented itself to focus, I am sure, on operations. As we are in this fiscally constrained environment, civilian oversight of SOCOM and the major force program 11 funding line is absolutely key and paramount.

Senator HAGAN. How will you be different than in the past?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I think it is about time. For me this is one of those issues, if confirmed, I will put significant time, effort, and resources against making sure we can do the proper oversight for SOCOM.

Senator HAGAN. Thank you.

Mr. Lumpkin, again. The Commander of our U.S. Special Operations, Admiral McRaven, has publicly highlighted the contributions that women have made to our special operations missions, including serving as members of the cultural support teams, military information support teams, civil military support elements, and in other roles. The Department earlier this year eliminated its so-called ground combat exclusion policy and will open all positions to service by women by 2016, unless excepted. The Department continues to study occupational standards required of all of our military specialties, and I expect this effort will eventually open up thousands of new positions to women, possibly including many in special operations.

I also want to note that we just lost one female cultural support member who was killed in the improvised explosive device attack this past week with the three other servicemembers. We certainly have women not only being a part of these teams, but certainly giving the ultimate sacrifice as part of this effort.

Mr. Lumpkin, what is your understanding of the current role of women in supporting our special operations missions, and if confirmed, what criteria would you use in assessing whether our special operations units should remain closed to service by women?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Thank you for that question.

Women are ever-present in the special operations community. When I commanded a team, I had numerous women who were within the structure of that team. I think that the special operations community has been very open to having women within its ranks.

I do know that Admiral McRaven have been charged to do a study, and his results are due, I think, by January 2016 on where the community is and where the assimilation of women throughout the ranks within special operations. If confirmed, I will work with Admiral McRaven to make sure that SOCOM does a complete and comprehensive study to make the best recommendation forward.

Senator HAGAN. The study is not due until January 2016. It is another 2-plus years?

Mr. LUMPKIN. My understanding is that that is when the recommendations or exclusions need to be submitted. But I can take that for you and confirm that date.

[The information referred to follows:]

The study on occupational standards is expected to be completed by July 2015. As I understand, the goal is to implement the findings by January 2016.

Senator HAGAN. It seems like that is a long time for a study. Okay. Thank you.

Dr. Rooney, in the current budgetary environment, there are significant pressures facing the broader DOD—of our science and technology (S&T) community. There are two significant challenges that I am sure you are aware of, given your last position. The first is the decreasing ability to recruit and retain our best scientists and engineers that obviously are being drawn into other competitive and lucrative sectors. The second is the decreasing ability to revitalize, much less maintain the infrastructure of the DOD's laboratories and our warfare centers to the standards being set in academic and private sector facilities.

If confirmed, what would you do specifically working with the Assistant Secretaries of the Navy for Research, Development, and Acquisition, Manpower and Reserve Affairs, and Installations and Environment to really ensure that the Navy's S&T enterprise can hire, can retain the best and the brightest scientists and engineers to work in a world-class environment that allows them to develop the next generation of capabilities for our future sailors and marines?

It really concerns me greatly that our education system is not up to the speed it needs to be from a science, technology, engineering, and math (STEM) background and a STEM education, our K–12 and our universities. We typically lose our girls in the middle school going into these engineering and math and science programs, but also the fact that there is such a competitive environment for these limited numbers of individuals. We certainly want to be sure we have the best and the brightest within DOD to be sure that we can compete on a global basis in this area.

Dr. ROONEY. Senator, I agree that it has been a problem in the past. In order to attract, as well as retain, because I think this is a two-pronged problem, we have to make sure that we have an environment in which these individuals can work, that they are supported in their creativity, that they have the tools that they need to work on new designs and the opportunities to do that, all of the areas of STEM. There have been STEM programs within the Department.

The problem comes in that we are in a competitive environment, and frankly the uncertainty of the last few years, the budgets, the lack of being able to have raises or have some of the tools that are available in private industry are only making this challenge even greater. It is very difficult to recruit. As I mentioned, over half of the Department of the Navy civilians fit in many of the categories you described. It is very difficult not only attracting newer and our younger and maybe our very creative different thinkers, but retaining when we are putting people on furloughs. We have challenges with hiring, and we have had little or no raises through the years.

We cannot compete with private industry, similar concerns that, frankly, I faced in higher education where you were trying to attract the best of the scientists and medical people to be not only researchers but your teachers, and you had to provide that level of environment and really show that you not only were willing to engage but that you valued the service. I think we have some basic foundational work to do in order to be an attractive place long-term for these individuals.

Senator HAGAN. Can you give me any recommendations that you think you might be sharing with us in the near future I hope?

Dr. ROONEY. I was going to say if confirmed, I absolutely will dive deeper into our specific programs, look at the types of things, particularly since I have been away from the Department for a year, that we have been trying to do, look at the data of who have we lost. Have they been our most senior people? Have we not recruited? That way we can tailor those tools. This is not a case of saying just throw money at it. There are specific things.

Senator HAGAN. Do you know what the retention is?

Dr. ROONEY. I do not, Senator, at this point, but if confirmed, I would definitely look into it. I started off as an engineer in college, and I was encouraged in math and science. I know the challenge. I challenge that young woman back there, who is the freshman in college, to do the same.

Senator HAGAN. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Hagan.

Senator Gillibrand?

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to direct my questions to the Honorable Jo Ann Rooney.

I understand earlier in your testimony Senator McCain asked you your views on sexual assault in the military, and your stated opinion was that you would like the decisionmaking about whether to go to trial to be done within the chain of command.

I have looked at your written statement, and I am extremely troubled by what you said. The question is, "In your view what would the impact of requiring a judge advocate outside the chain of command to determine whether allegations of sexual assault should be prosecuted? Your answer is, "A judge advocate outside the chain of command will be looking at a case through a different lens than a military commander. I believe the impact would be decisions based on evidence rather than the interest in preserving good order and discipline. I believe this will result in fewer prosecutions and therefore defeat the problem that I understand it seeks to address."

You are an attorney. Correct? Under what world would you recommend the decision about whether a serious crime, meaning a conviction could mean more than a year or more, should not be based on the evidence?

Dr. ROONEY. That statement meant that someone outside the chain of command—and often as an attorney, you are bound by the rules of evidence as to whether you will take a case forward for any prosecution. A commander also must look at evidence, and the implication was not that the commander would not, but a commander also has some additional tools that they could use that are non-judicial punishment in order to be able to address that command climate and change the attitudes towards it. That is what that statement——

Senator GILLIBRAND. Under our proposed legislation, Article 15, non-judicial punishment, is retained by all commanders, as are all crimes of mission. I am highly concerned that you believe there should be any context or that decision should not be based solely on evidence about whether you try a case.

Members of the military still retain civil liberties. They still have basic rights of justice, and if you are trying to tip the scales in favor of a defendant or in favor of a victim, that is also inappropriate. You want cases going forward that have evidence that merit a prosecution. You want nothing else because if you drive cases forward because you feel like it or because you do not like the perpetrator or do not like the accused or really like the victim, you are using bias. Bias is not effective in making a prosecutorial decision. You should have an objective review based only on the evidence because we do not want a justice system that favors victims. We do not want a justice system that favors defendants. We want an objective justice system that provides justice for an accused, for a perpetrator who is going to be reviewed fairly and for a victim who is looking for a fair shot. You need an objective justice system.

I do not believe that the chain of command should be using the threat of prosecution as a cudgel or a tool to manipulate or determine how their troops will behave. They have other means to do that. They are the ones solely responsible for command climate, solely responsible for good order and discipline. But that decision point, that legal decision point, should be made solely on the basis of evidence.

Do you believe a commander should base that decision on something other than evidence about whether to go to trial for a serious crime?

Dr. ROONEY. No, ma'am. As I just said, they must look at the evidence, of course. That is key to it. They have legal teams around them that can help them understand those. But they also have other tools and other ways to impact what is clearly an issue that also goes to command climate and also goes to changing a culture. We have to be able to hold that commander accountable.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Those tools remain within the commander's purview entirely. That commander is solely responsible for good order and discipline. That commander is solely responsible for command climate. Those responsibilities will never change. What we are urging is that the legal decision that requires training, legal training, prosecutorial discretion, prosecutorial judgment, and an objective review. A review that does not entail knowing the perpetrator and knowing the victim, having preconceived notions of whether women should be in the armed services, having preconceived notions about whether you can serve if you are from the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender community.

Have you reviewed this legislation, this proposed change?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, I am aware of the legislation, and I am also aware of the panel that has been put together to have an independent assessment, be able to outline both the challenges and the implications going forward. As I mentioned to Senator Blumenthal, I would remain very open to the information that comes out of that group in order that, if confirmed, I would work with this committee and Congress to move forward on a sustainable and true solution going forward.

Senator GILLIBRAND. When Dick Cheney was the Secretary of Defense some 20-odd years ago, he said there was zero tolerance for sexual assault in the military. Since that time, there have been dozens of reports. Have you reviewed those reports and recommendations? Do we really need another report and recommendation to finally protect victims within the armed services?

Dr. ROONEY. I believe that what that panel's job to do is to really take the time now not just to make a report, but to outline just so all of us are basing any conversations and decisions and best paths forward on an independent assessment. It is not, from my understanding, designed to either slow this process down or come to a foregone conclusion. That is why seeing what that group did and working together on a common solution is something, if confirmed, I would be very open to doing.

Senator GILLIBRAND. I have seen boxes of reports, boxes, over 25 years on the same issue.

Are you familiar with what the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services (DACOWITS) panel is?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, I am.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Do you understand that they have just issued a report recommending this change?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, I am.

Senator GILLIBRAND. What do you think the value of that recommendation is since the sole responsibility of the DACOWITS panel is to recommend to Secretary Hagel ideas about how to protect and preserve and to maintain a strong armed services with regard to women in particular?

Dr. ROONEY. I believe that they have fulfilled their role to make that recommendation going forward. I also know that based on what I have seen in the history of our military, that they have been using the existing command structure and using a commander's ability to influence climate and control have been very successful in making some very significant changes, whether it was integrating the forces on down to the recent implementation of the repeal of Don't Ask/Don't Tell. There is also support for how that command structure can be part of and, frankly, drive significant cultural change.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Do you remember what the response was from our commanders when we tried to repeal Don't Ask/Don't Tell, when we tried to integrate women into the Services, when we tried to integrate the Services with African Americans? Do you remember what their response was?

Dr. ROONEY. Not word for word.

Senator GILLIBRAND. You cannot possibly do this because it will undermine good order and discipline.

Do you know what their response was when we had a hearing on sexual assault in the military and we suggested that Article 60 should be removed, the authority to overturn a jury verdict? Do you know what the response was? From the commanders that testified, it was you cannot possibly do this because it will undermine good order and discipline.

The day after Secretary Hagel recommends that Article 60 authority is no longer necessary, the commanders said that is fine. It is a vestige of pre-World War I. Of course, we can implement that.

I think this is the same excuse we have heard over and over again. To have the DACOWITS panel, who has been investigating these issues for 20 years, to make a recommendation to the Secretary of Defense that not only should you take the decisionmaking for all serious crimes out of the chain of command, but you should give that decisionmaking to trained military prosecutors as a way to create a more objective system so justice is possible is a recommendation I think you should take seriously.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Gillibrand.

We are going to have a brief second round.

Following up on Senator Gillibrand's questions, you have been a university president. Is that correct?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir, I have.

Chairman LEVIN. You have had situations where you have had sexual assaults and have had to deal with civilian prosecutors and what their attitude is towards prosecuting sexual assaults. Is that correct?

Dr. ROONEY. Unfortunately, sir, yes, I have.

Chairman LEVIN. What has been that experience?

Dr. ROONEY. It has actually been mixed. It has not been an unwillingness of prosecutors to take on cases, but if they felt they did not have very strong evidence going forward, they were unwilling, frankly, to move those forward. I do not mean to imply that that is all prosecutors. I am just narrowing that down to my experience in two different university settings. It really was not a tool we were able to use to actually impact what was happening on the campuses.

Chairman LEVIN. Because of the reluctance of civilian prosecutors in difficult cases to proceed?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, and for the victims to feel that nothing was going to happen at that level. It was not something that they used as a way to feel confident that moving forward, something would be done. It continues to remain a vexing challenge.

Chairman LEVIN. In the civilian world?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. A commander does not have that same kind of reluctance in tough cases. He can proceed or she can proceed because it needs to be prosecuted in their judgment. Is that correct?

Dr. ROONEY. That is it. If there is not the ability to take it forward on a prosecution, again there are other ways to be able to make sure that that climate is changed and victims are protected and that no tolerance for that type of behavior is reinforced. It is the commander's job.

Chairman LEVIN. Are you familiar with the decision which was made relative to race that we were going to get rid of racism in the military? Commanders were ordered and because they are commanders and in a chain of command, that they in fact implemented finally a policy against racism and prejudice in the military with some real success, as a matter of fact. Are you familiar with that?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir. In fact, that was one of the examples that I mentioned, that as well as the most recent one that I have had the most direct experience with.

Chairman LEVIN. Are you familiar with the Don't Ask/Don't Tell situation where, although we had commanders, in fact, top commanders right here, urging us not to do it, that we did it anyway, and that they then directed their commanders to implement the repeal of Don't Ask/Don't Tell and end discrimination against gay people in the military? They have done it with real success because of the power of the commanders.

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir, I am very familiar with that, in fact, was very much involved during my tenure in the Department with that initiative.

Chairman LEVIN. Let me ask Mr. Lumpkin this question. You have testified that from an operational point of view, it is helpful that an interrogation not have a fixed deadline. In your view, is it also important that an interrogation comply with the requirements of common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and that the detainee or detainees not be subject to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment at any time?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Absolutely, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay. Senator Kaine?

Senator KAINE. I have just one question, Mr. Chairman, for Mr. Lumpkin.

Mr. Lumpkin, as we are pursuing a troop drawdown in Afghanistan, the special forces have been deeply instrumental in training efforts of Afghan security around special operations and others. What is your current assessment of Afghan readiness and force effectiveness in preparation for 2014 and beyond?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Significant strides have been made during the past decade of building the Afghan capability. We are going to make use of the remainder of the known time we have because there is always further progress that can be made. I think one of the reasons why we would want to keep some sort of force there is to continue that partnership to make sure we can continue to work with them post-2014, if possible.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Kaine.

Senator King?

Senator KING. Dr. Rooney, just another follow-up on this question. I find this question of chain of command and sexual assault a very difficult one. I have decided to come down on the side of not making that change.

One of the things that convinced me was I want the commander to feel responsible for this issue. Is that a legitimate way of thinking about this?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir, it absolutely is. I know in particular in the Navy, the commander's ability and the result of their command and control and command climate is a critical piece that is considered for any promotion or any future command. That is absolutely true. There are many ways to hold that commander accountable. As I said, that is their job.

Senator KING. I am sure you are aware, but in the National Defense Authorization Bill that has been reported out of this committee, there are numerous changes in the law in regard to this problem. The one that is not made is the one that we have been discussing about taking the decision out of the chain of command, but there are many other changes to strengthen the military.

On the other hand, you are bearing the brunt of this because you are here today for the Navy. This is clearly a DOD issue. But Senator Gillibrand's point is well taken, that this has been a problem for a long time and at some point, this committee and Congress is going to say enough is enough and we are going to make much more dramatic changes. I hope that as you are working with the naval commanders, that you will make it clear that this really does require a culture change and it has to start right away because time is running out on patience for this problem to be resolved.

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir. All of our collective patience should be challenged on this to get a solution that works and that we can prove that works moving forward.

Senator KING. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Dr. Rooney, in terms of the experience you have had with the Department at large, you have been, as I understand it, the Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness and the Acting Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, I gather at the same time. Is that correct?

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir, it is.

Chairman LEVIN. For how long a period was it?

Dr. ROONEY. The overlap was for a period of——

Chairman LEVIN. No, not the overlap, but together how long?

Dr. ROONEY. Oh, together? Just under 2 years.

Chairman LEVIN. Dr. Rooney, you were asked a question by Senator McCain and you committed to get an answer for the record about the audit schedule I believe for the Navy.

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay, and that was a very important question, an appropriate question. If you can promptly get us that answer for the record as to whether that audit schedule for 2014 and 2017 I believe. You did not know the answer here as to whether it is on schedule, but if you could promptly find out as much as you can and then give us your opinion the best you can as to whether or not it is on schedule and do that for the record, it would be very helpful in terms of proceeding with this.

Dr. ROONEY. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. That is another area where patience is wearing thing.

Chairman LEVIN. Where patience has not worn thin this morning is Liam. You have really been a big help to your dad because you have sat there now for I do not know many hours looking interested in every single question that was asked, and you have been a big help to your dad. I want to commend you. I know how proud your parents are of you and your grandparents sitting here are of you. I have six grandchildren, one of whom is a boy just about your age. I know he would be just as patient and supporting as you have been. I do not want to compare it in any way.

Thank you to all of the people who have come with our nominees today. We thank you and I know they thank you for your support. We thank our nominees.

We will stand adjourned and hope we can proceed with these nominations very expeditiously. Thank you all.

[Whereupon, at 11:53 a.m., the committee adjourned.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Mr. Michael D. Lumpkin by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the special operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the Military Departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act or special operations reform provisions? If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. No. The Goldwater-Nichols Act and current special operations authorities have served the Department and our Nation well and enhanced the Department's capabilities to respond when required. If confirmed, I will make proposals for modifications if and when required.

DUTIES

Question. Section 138(b)(4) of title 10, U.S.C., describes the duties and roles of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low-Intensity Conflict (ASD(SO/LIC)).

What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the ASD(SO/LIC)?

Answer. The ASD(SO/LIC) is the principal civilian advisor to the Secretary of Defense on special operations and low intensity conflict matters. The ASD(SO/LIC) has overall supervision (to include oversight of policy and resources) of special operations and low-intensity conflict activities which encompass policies pertaining to Department of Defense special operations' capabilities and authorities, counternarcotic efforts and resources, humanitarian assistance and disaster relief, strategies for building partner capacity, and stability operations in accordance with the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy's priorities and guidance.

Question. What Department of Defense (DOD) activities are currently encompassed by the Department's definition of special operations and low-intensity conflict?

Answer. Special operations and low intensity conflict activities, as defined section 167 of title 10 U.S.C., include direct action, strategic reconnaissance, unconventional warfare, foreign internal defense, civil affairs, psychological operations, counterterrorism, humanitarian assistance, theater search and rescue, and such other activities as may be specified by the President or Secretary of Defense.

Question. If confirmed, what changes, if any, in the duties and functions of ASD(SO/LIC) do you expect that the Secretary of Defense would prescribe for you?

Answer. At present, I do not expect the Secretary of Defense would make any changes to the duties and functions assigned of ASD(SO/LIC).

Question. In your view, are the duties set forth in section 138(b)(4) of title 10, U.S.C., up to date, or should changes be considered?

Answer. Yes, I believe the duties of the ASD(SO/LIC) as prescribed in section 138(b)(4) of title 10 continue to remain relevant and provide the ASD(SO/LIC) appropriate and clear authority to serve as the principal civilian advisor to the Secretary of Defense on special operations and low intensity conflict matters. I do not believe any changes are needed at this time.

Question. Do you believe that there are actions you need to take to enhance your ability to perform the duties of the ASD(SO/LIC)?

Answer. Not at present, but if confirmed I would make an assessment of this and provide recommendations as needed to improve my oversight of Special Operations.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. I believe I am uniquely qualified for this position because of my broad background in all aspects of the SO/LIC portfolio.

I have been directly involved in the arena of special operations since the 1980's when I began a career as a naval officer and U.S. Navy SEAL. During my time on active duty, I served throughout the world in places such as Afghanistan, Colombia, El Salvador, the Horn of Africa, and Iraq. As a U.S. Navy SEAL, I held every leadership position from Platoon Commander to Team Commanding Officer. During my time in uniform, I garnered significant experience in counternarcotics, counterterrorism, counterinsurgency, and security sector assistance.

After my military service, in addition to serving in other Federal departments, I served as Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict and Acting ASD(SO/LIC).

Additionally, I have a strong management background and served in the principal leadership positions of Chief Executive Officer and Director in the private sector.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. In carrying out your duties, how will you work with the following:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I will perform my duties as the principal advisor to the Secretary of Defense on all special operations, assisting the Secretary in the development and employment of Special Operations Forces (SOF) to achieve U.S. national security objectives. I will engage the Secretary on U.S. counterterrorism strategy and operations, offer policy guidance and oversight of international efforts to combat narcotics trafficking and transnational organized crime, and inform the Secretary regarding the Department's support to peacekeeping, humanitarian assistance, and stability operations across the globe.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I will keep the Deputy Secretary informed as well as provide advice and support on current and future special operations activities, capabilities, plans, and authorities, ongoing and projected counterterrorism efforts and priorities, and the development and employment of stability operations, counternarcotic programs, and peacekeeping efforts.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work very closely supporting the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy. I will keep the Under Secretary informed as well as provide advice and support on current and future special operations activities, capabilities, plans, and authorities, ongoing and projected counterterrorism efforts and priorities, and the development and employment of stability operations, counternarcotics programs, and peacekeeping efforts.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence.

Answer. Special operations and intelligence are mutually supporting, so, if confirmed, I will continue to foster the close working relationship with the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Asian and Pacific Security Affairs, and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Homeland Defense and Americas' Security Affairs.

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to work closely with the regional Assistant Secretaries of Defense in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, providing advice regarding special operations and stability operations that are ongoing or in the planning stage. We would also work together on policies to build partner capacity, counternarcotics, and combat global threats. I would also anticipate working very closely with the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Global Security Affairs on our counterproliferation and cyber policy efforts.

Question. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. If confirmed, I plan to maintain a close working relationship with the Chairman, the Chiefs, and the Chairman's staff. Effective policy and resource oversight of special operations to include successful implementation of our counterterrorism strategies requires continued close coordination and collaboration with the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Chiefs of Staff, and the Chairman's staff.

Question. The Service Secretaries and Service Chiefs.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the Military Department Secretaries and Service Chiefs to ensure that the requirements to organize, train, and equip personnel and units that enable or support Special Operations Forces are met and maintained. I would also work with them to ensure adequate resourcing of Service-common requirements and infrastructure for Special Operations Forces.

Question. The Geographic Combatant Commanders.

Answer. The geographic combatant commands are at the forefront of the global fight against terrorists and violent extremists. They are responsible for maintaining a forward posture to deter and dissuade adversaries and assure and build the capabilities of our allies. If confirmed, I will work closely with the geographic combatant commands in all of these areas.

Question. Commander, U.S. Special Operations Command.

Answer. The Commander, U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM) and the ASD(SO/LIC) have a close relationship in defining and meeting the needs of our Special Operations Forces. If confirmed, I am committed to maximizing that relationship in order to fulfill my responsibilities in accordance with the ASD(SO/LIC)'s statutory requirement to oversee the policy and resources for special operations activities.

Question. The Commanders of the Service Special Operations Commands.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Service special operations commands to ensure they have the policies and resources needed to develop and provide the capabilities needed by the Commander, SOCOM, and the regional combatant commanders.

Question. Chief, National Guard Bureau.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Chief, National Guard Bureau, to ensure they have the policies and resources needed to develop and provide the capabilities supporting the priorities of our geographic combatant commands.

Question. The Director of National Intelligence.

Answer. As mentioned above, special operations and intelligence are mutually supporting. If confirmed, I will work closely to support the Director of National Intelligence and his subordinates ensuring both parties are appropriately engaged and informed on items of shared national security interest.

Question. The Director of Central Intelligence.

Answer. Again, special operations and intelligence are mutually supporting. If confirmed, I will work closely to support the Director of Central Intelligence and his subordinates ensuring close, continuing collaboration on items of shared national security interests.

Question. The Director, National Counter Terrorism Center.

Answer. SOF activities are central to counterterrorism; the NCTC helps ensure coordination of all U.S. Government counterterrorism activities. If confirmed, I will maintain ASD(SO/LIC)'s role as the primary Office of the Secretary of Defense's interface on SOF and counterterrorism matters.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PRIORITIES

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges confronting the ASD(SO/LIC)?

Answer. With growing fiscal constraints in the Department, it will be a challenge to protect our vital defense capabilities. ASD(SO/LIC) must continue to ensure SOF has the adequate resources, training, and equipment as well as authorities to execute and support U.S. counterterrorism strategies as an essential component of our U.S. national security policies. As the Department rebalances efforts and resources toward the Asia Pacific region coupled with the approaching draw down of forces in Afghanistan, ASD(SO/LIC) must continue to shape policies and provide expertise on all special operations and Department of Defense (DOD) support to peacekeeping, humanitarian assistance and stability operations across the globe. Terrorism remains a persistent threat to our national security, and while al Qaeda core has been degraded, the evolving threat of al Qaeda-affiliated networks endures. Many of these terrorist networks that directly threaten American interests are not confined to the geographic boundaries of any one country; therefore, it is vital that the Department remain focused on denying al Qaeda and its affiliate's their transnational safe havens.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work within the Department and the interagency to ensure that programs key to effective counter terrorism operations are properly supported. While ASD(SO/LIC) will remain the focal point for coordinating the Department's strategic counterterrorism guidance, I would engage my counterparts across the interagency to implement effective programs building our partner's capacity and thereby advancing mutual security interests. I will balance my effort to ensure the Department remains capable of supporting peacekeeping, humanitarian, and stability operations across the globe.

Question. If confirmed, how would you seek to balance responsibilities for operational issues within your portfolio with the "Service Secretary-like" responsibilities for Special Operations Forces?

Answer. Balance is very important as we enter into a resource constrained environment. Ensuring that our SOF retains their qualitative advantage into the future and that they and their families are taken care of is a top priority. To achieve this, SOF must be properly resourced to include having the best equipment and training available, and a well-educated force. If confirmed as ASD(SO/LIC), I will make every effort to assert the ASD(SO/LIC) role in the resourcing process. This would include participation in SOCOM's Commander's Roundtable which is the SOCOM resource decision forum. Through constant collaboration with the senior leadership at SOCOM, we would ensure that Major Force Program (MFP) 11 funds are used to maintain a strong and ready force. I would also work closely with the Services to ensure that service common support is identified and provided.

Question. If confirmed, what broad priorities would you establish in terms of issues which must be addressed by the ASD(SO/LIC)?

Answer. If confirmed, my broad priorities would be to ensure our Nation continues to have the world's premier special operations capabilities to win the current fight against al Qaeda and its affiliates, while shaping the force for future operations in a very uncertain global security environment. Drivers of success—namely the operational readiness of the force, the care of our people, and sustainment of resources will be among the key issues I will address.

CIVILIAN OVERSIGHT OF THE U.S. SPECIAL OPERATIONS COMMAND

Question. The legislation creating the U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM) assigned extraordinary authority to the commander to conduct some of the functions of both a military service and a unified combatant command.

Which civilian officials in the DOD exercise civilian oversight of the "service-like" authorities of the Commander, SOCOM?

Answer. Per title 10, U.S.C. § 138 and DOD Directive 5111.10 (in accordance with Under Secretary of Defense for Policy priorities and guidance), the ASD(SO/LIC) is the principal civilian oversight for all special operations activities. Other DOD civilian officials also exercise oversight in some capacity:

- Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (USD(I)) coordinates on intelligence issues
- Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (USD(AT&L)) coordinates on acquisition issues
- Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness (USD(P&R)) coordinates on personnel policies such as SOF-unique incentives and readiness issues
- Under Secretary of Defense for Comptroller (USD(C)) coordinates on SOF budget and year-of-execution program issues
- Military Department Secretaries coordinate on SOF manpower issues
- Director, OSD/Cost Assessment Program Evaluation (CAPE), coordinates on SOF Program development and issues

Question. In your view, what organizational relationship should exist between the ASD(SO/LIC) and the Commander, SOCOM?

Answer. ASD(SO/LIC) provides civilian oversight of all special operations matters as required by title 10, U.S.C. § 138. As such, the ASD(SO/LIC) provides Service Secretary-like oversight of special operations policy and resource matters and advice to implement Secretary of Defense and Under Secretary of Defense for Policy priorities. The relationship with the Commander, SOCOM should be collaborative and cooperative to develop the best possible special operations forces and employ them effectively. Ultimately, the ASD(SO/LIC) represents the Secretary of Defense and provides recommendations regarding special operations that are in the best interest of the Department.

Question. What should be the role of the ASD(SO/LIC) in preparation and review of Major Force Program (MFP) 11 and SOCOM's Program Objective Memorandum (POM)?

Answer. The ASD(SO/LIC) provides policy oversight for the preparation and justification of the Special Operations Forces' program and budget. Ensuring that the SOCOM POM is aligned with national priorities and in support of the national defense strategy is key. The ASD(SO/LIC) currently attends the SOCOM Commanders' Roundtable—the SOCOM resource decision forum—to help ensure the POM is aligned to the Department's guidance. During program reviews, the ASD(SO/LIC) works closely with the Deputy Secretary of Defense and the Director, CAPE, to resolve issues across the Department. If confirmed, I will work closely with all parties to ensure our Nation sustains a ready, capable Special Operations Force, prepared to meet the fiscal, operational, and global challenges we face today and into the future.

Question. What is the appropriate role of the ASD(SO/LIC) in the research and development and procurement functions of SOCOM?

Answer. The appropriate role of ASD(SO/LIC) is to provide policy oversight in resolving special operations acquisition issues. As the lead Office of the Secretary of Defense official for SOF acquisition matters, the ASD(SO/LIC) represents SOF acquisition interests within DOD and before Congress. The responsibilities and relationships between the ASD(SO/LIC) and the Commander, SOCOM are defined and described in a Memorandum of Agreement between the ASD and Commander, SOCOM. The ASD directs and provides policy oversight to technology development programs that address priority mission areas to meet other departmental, interagency, and international capability needs.

Question. What is the appropriate role of the ASD(SO/LIC) in the operational planning of missions that involve special operations forces, whether the supported command is SOCOM, a geographic combatant command, or another department or agency of the U.S. Government?

Answer. The ASD(SO/LIC) serves as the principal advisor to the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy and the Secretary of Defense for all aspects of employment, deployment, and oversight of special operations and counterterrorism capabilities. The ASD(SO/LIC) provides policy oversight of SOCOM's mission planning and geographic combatant commanders' employment of SOF to ensure compliance with law and DOD priorities. The ASD(SO/LIC) coordinates deployment authorities and plans involving SOF within DOD and with interagency partners as required.

IMPACT OF SEQUESTRATION

Question. The President's budget request and the fiscal year 2014 spending bills for the Department of Defense considered by Congress to date assume an agreement that would avoid sequestration for fiscal year 2014. In the absence of such an agreement, the Department of Defense will face a second year of sequestration and an across-the-board reduction of approximately $52 billion.

What are your views on the impact sequestration is having on the readiness of special operations forces and how would those impacts be exacerbated if sequestration continues in fiscal year 2014 and beyond?

Answer. Sequestration has a negative effect on readiness across the Department. If confirmed, I will work closely with Congress, the DOD Comptroller, and SOCOM to assess the particular impact of sequestration on SOF, particularly to ensure we can sustain the right level of capability, capacity, and readiness across the Future Years Defense Program, aligned to current strategy and available resources.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS COMMAND ACQUISITION AUTHORITIES

Question. SOCOM is unique within the DOD as the only unified command with acquisition authorities and funding. Further, the Commander of SOCOM is the only uniformed commander with a subordinate senior acquisition executive.

If confirmed, how would you ensure SOCOM requirements are adequately vetted and balanced against available resources before moving forward with an acquisition program?

Answer. The ASD(SO/LIC) is closely involved in all facets of the SOCOM Planning, Programming, Budgeting, and Execution system, providing oversight of these matters. Other forums used by the ASD(SO/LIC) include: the USD(AT&L) Acquisition Review of Department Systems, the SOCOM Commanders' Roundtable, the SOCOM Integrated Concept Team Reviews, and SOCOM Budget and Acquisition Reviews. Additionally, through the annual DOD Program Budget Review process, the ASD(SO/LIC) is able to ensure that SOCOM's priorities and resource allocation are in alignment with the Department's strategic and policy imperatives.

Question. What role can SOCOM's development and acquisition activities play in broader service and DOD efforts?

Answer. SOCOM can continue to serve as an incubator for developing new equipment and capabilities that initially are for special operations-specific needs but often transition to the General Purpose Force. Noteworthy is SOCOM's ability to conduct rapid evaluations of technology, systems, and concepts of operations, and the ability to integrate emerging off-the-shelf technologies.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure that special operations capabilities and requirements are integrated into overall DOD research, development and acquisition programs?

Answer. If confirmed, I would continue to support the regularly-convened SOCOM-led "Acquisition Summits" with OSD, drawing together SOCOM, USD(AT&L), and the Service Acquisition Executives where all elements discuss acquisition issues of common interest.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure sufficient resources are dedicated to the development of special operations-unique platforms, when required?

Answer. ASD(SO/LIC) is closely involved and integrated with SOCOM's planning, resourcing, and execution. Additionally, the ASD(SO/LIC) attends the SOCOM Commanders' Roundtable quarterly meetings, which allows the ASD to maintain awareness of matters of concern and import to SOCOM and its subordinate commands. Finally, ASD(SO/LIC) representatives sit on the SOCOM Special Operations Requirements Board to ensure SOF requirements are ready for funding. If confirmed, I will advocate for steady and predictable resourcing of SOCOM and oversee the investment strategy. If confirmed, I will also provide advice and support to the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy as he sits on critical resource decisionmaking bodies.

Question. If confirmed, what metrics will you use to determine the effectiveness of SOCOM technology development investments and whether SOCOM is investing sufficient resources in these efforts?

Answer. SOCOM has created a series of technology roadmaps that are effective in identifying promising solutions to meet operational requirements. These roadmaps have quantifiable metrics (e.g., cost, schedule, performance, and technology readiness) embedded in them and allow the ASD(SO/LIC) to oversee and monitor progress and identify obstacles that may require Department-level involvement.

Question. If confirmed, how will you ensure that SOCOM has an acquisition workforce with the skills, qualifications, and experience needed to develop and manage its acquisition and research and development programs?

Answer. If confirmed, I would support SOCOM's efforts to manage the SOF acquisition workforce, which is similar to the process used by the Service Acquisition Executives. SOCOM's acquisition workforce experts are professionally trained and certified, and have substantial experience in the SOF-unique processes needed to meet the equipping needs of SOF. I would also support SOCOM's efforts with USD(AT&L) to expand its organic acquisition workforce, as well as to create a unique identifier for SOF acquisition positions.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

Question. Some have argued that the Commander of SOCOM should have greater influence on special operations personnel management issues including assignment, promotion, compensation, and retention of special operations forces. One proposal would modify section 167 of title 10, U.S.C., to change the role of the SOCOM Commander from "monitoring" the readiness of special operations personnel to "coordinating" with the Services on personnel and manpower management policies that directly affect Special Operations Forces.

What is your view of this proposal?

Answer. Personnel policies and management are arguably the most effective tool for incentivizing characteristics and culture in an organization. Currently, Commander, SOCOM, provides input to Service personnel policies that effect SOF, but has no direct influence or control over the assignment, promotion, or command selection of SOF personnel. Changing section 167 of title 10, U.S.C., to reflect the word "coordinating" rather than "monitoring" would give SOCOM more influence over Service personnel policies that affect SOF accessions, assignments, compensation, promotions, professional development, readiness, retention, and training. However, I believe that additional coordination and study should be done within the Department to fully understand the impact of this proposal.

SIZE OF SPECIAL OPERATIONS FORCES

Question. The previous two Quadrennial Defense Reviews (QDR) have mandated significant growth in our Special Operations Forces and enablers that directly support their operations.

Do you believe QDR-directed growth in the size of Special Operations Forces can and should be maintained in light of current fiscal challenges?

What do you believe would be the impact on the ability of Special Operations Forces to meet global requirements if QDR-directed growth is not realized? What if special operations end strength is reduced below current levels?

Answer. I believe the uncertain security environment necessitates a review of our SOF force structure, balanced against our strategy and resources, during each QDR and program review. If confirmed, I will work closely with colleagues in DOD and with the SOCOM Commander to ensure our Nation has a ready, capable Special Operations Force to address current and future threats.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS MISSIONS

Question. In recent years, Special Operations Forces have taken on an expanded role in a number of areas important to countering violent extremist organizations, including those related to information and military intelligence operations. Some have advocated significant changes to SOCOM's title 10 missions to make them better reflect the activities Special Operations Forces are carrying out around the world.

What current missions, if any, do you believe can and should be divested by SOCOM, and why?

Answer. I fully support the 2010 QDR's strategic shift toward expanding general purpose forces' capabilities and capacity for irregular threats. However, I believe that SOF must maintain a very robust capability to train, equip, and advise foreign security forces as part of ensuring SOF capability to conduct operations in politically sensitive environments, ensuring access for other SOF activities, and ensuring the ability to train, equip, and advise either Special Operations Forces or irregular forces. At this time, I do not advocate significant changes to SOCOM's title 10 missions. If confirmed, I will make recommendations of any mission divestitures if and when required.

Question. Are there any additional missions that you believe SOCOM should assume, and, if so, what are they and why do you advocate adding them?

Answer. No. If confirmed, I will make recommendations of any additional missions for SOF if and when required.

COMBATTING TERRORISM

Question. The National Strategy for Counterterrorism highlights the need to maintain pressure on al Qaeda's core while building the capacity of partners to confront mutual threats. The strategy also underscores the need to augment efforts to counter threats from al Qaeda-linked threats "that continue to emerge from beyond its core safe haven in South Asia." The President signed new Policy Guidance on Counterterrorism on May 22, 2013, that established a framework governing the use of force against terrorists.

How do you view DOD's role under the National Strategy for Counterterrorism?

Answer. The President's National Strategy for Counterterrorism maintains the focus on pressuring al Qaeda's core while emphasizing the need to build foreign partnerships and capacity and to strengthen our resilience. Overarching goals are to protect the American people, Homeland, and interests; disrupt, degrade, dismantle, and defeat al Qaeda; prevent terrorists from acquiring or using weapons of mass destruction; eliminate safe havens; build enduring counterterrorism partnerships; degrade links between al Qaeda and its affiliates and adherents; counter al Qaeda's ideology; and deprive terrorists of their financial support and other enablers.

The U.S. Government remains engaged in a multi-departmental, multinational effort. DOD continues to undertake activities to support this strategy including training, advising, and assisting partner security forces; supporting intelligence collection on al Qaeda; conducting information operations against al Qaeda; and, when appropriate, capturing or killing al Qaeda operatives. However, DOD is also committed to enabling its intelligence and law enforcement partners, both in the United States and overseas, in their efforts to counter this threat.

Question. What is your understanding of the impact of the President's guidance for the use of force in counterterrorism operations outside the United States and areas of active hostilities on DOD's role within the U.S. Government's counterterrorism strategy?

Answer. The President's guidance formalizes and strengthens the administration's rigorous process for reviewing and approving operations to capture or employ lethal force against terrorist targets outside the United States and outside areas of active hostilities. By establishing a clear set of criteria that must be met before lethal action may be taken, the guidance will help focus DOD's planning and preparation for these operations. If confirmed, I will make a formal assessment of the impact of the new guidance and provide my best advice to the Secretary and the President to ensure we're doing everything we can to protect our Nation from terrorist attacks.

Question. Will DOD see its role increase or decrease as a result of the President's counterterrorism guidance?

Answer. The guidance establishes standards and procedures that are either already in place or will be transitioned over time. As such, I do not anticipate a significant change in the Department's role. If confirmed, I intend to ensure we conduct counterterrorism operations lawfully, and in accordance with this policy.

Question. If the role increases, what, if any, are the commensurate increases in capabilities or capacities that are required?

Answer. If there is an increase in our role, if confirmed, I will work closely with colleagues to ensure our department has the requisite capabilities to execute our counterterrorism responsibilities in accordance with the policy.

Question. Will DOD require any new authorities?

Answer. At this time, it is my understanding the Department of Defense does not require any new authorities to carry out our counterterrorism responsibilities.

Question. Are there steps DOD should take to better coordinate its efforts to combat terrorism with those of other Federal departments and agencies?

Answer. I believe the Department of Defense routine coordination with other Federal departments and agencies adequately addresses its efforts to combat terrorist networks and threats to American interests.

Question. What do you view as the role of DOD in countering al Qaeda and affiliated groups in cyberspace?

Answer. It is important that DOD retain the resources and expertise to counter al Qaeda's propaganda and recruitment efforts in cyberspace, in order to effectively complement the State department's primacy of communications outside of combat zones.

THE 2001 AUTHORIZATION FOR USE OF MILITARY FORCE

Question. What is your understanding of the scope and duration of the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF)?

Answer. The AUMF was enacted by Congress on September 18, 2001 (Public Law 107–40), and it provides "that the President is authorized to use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001, or harbored such organizations or persons, in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons." The AUMF remains law; it has not been amended or repealed.

Question. What factors govern Department of Defense determinations as to where the use of force is authorized, and against whom, pursuant to the AUMF?

Answer. Outside of Afghanistan, without touching on matters that may be classified, I would note that targeting decisions are made based on careful, fact-intensive assessments, and review, in order to identify those individuals and groups that are appropriately targetable. This review continues up the chain of command through the four-star combatant commander and to the Secretary of Defense.

Question. Do you believe that current legal authorities, including the AUMF, enable the Department to carry out counterterrorism operations and activities at the level that you believe to be necessary and appropriate?

Answer. Yes, I believe that DOD's current legal authorities, including the AUMF and the President's constitutional authority as Commander in Chief and Chief Executive, are necessary and appropriate.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS AUTHORITIES

Question. Reportedly, the Commander of SOCOM has sought more control over the deployment and utilization of Special Operations Forces. For example, the Secretary of Defense modified policy guidance for the combatant commands earlier this year that gave SOCOM, for the first time, responsibility for resourcing, organizing, and providing guidance to the Theater Special Operations Commands of the geographic combatant commanders (GCC) and Special Operations Forces assigned to them. It has been reported that the Commander of SOCOM is also seeking new authorities that would allow him to more rapidly move special operations forces between geographic combatant commands.

Please provide your assessment of whether such changes are appropriate and can be made without conflicting with civilian control of the military, infringing upon authorities provided to the geographic combatant commanders, or raising concerns with the State Department.

Answer. On February 11, 2013, the Secretary of Defense approved an update to the Forces For Unified Commands Memorandum for Fiscal Year 2013 that assigns all Special Operations Forces to Commander, SOCOM. This improved command relationship gives Commander, SOCOM, the flexibility to meet geographic combatant commander requirements with sustained, persistent SOF capabilities and capacities more effectively in order to accomplish regional objectives in support of national strategic end states. GCCs continue to exercise operational control of Special Operations Forces once deployed into a GCC area of responsibility.

INTELLIGENCE OPERATIONS

Question. In your view, how are intelligence operations carried out by special operations personnel different from those carried out by others in the Intelligence Community?

Answer. In my view, SOF intelligence operations are complementary and mutually supporting to those carried out by the Intelligence Community (IC). These operations comply with the policies and regulations guiding DOD and interagency activities.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure intelligence activities carried out by Special Operations Forces are coordinated adequately with other activities carried out by those in the Intelligence Community?

Answer. I believe that interagency collaboration is the most important contributing factor to many of SOF's achievements. If confirmed, I will oversee, maintain, and build upon the important relationships SOCOM has developed with the Federal intelligence and law enforcement agencies.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the authorities and agreements which are in place to allow U.S. military personnel to carry out missions under the authorities contained in title 50, U.S.C.?

Answer. The Secretary of Defense has authority under title 10 and title 50, U.S.C. to conduct operations vital to our national defense. DOD activities conducted under title 50 support intelligence collection for the Department as well as for the Nation. U.S. military personnel are employed across the spectrum of tactical to strategic operations in support of these requirements.

INFORMATION OPERATIONS

Question. The Government Accountability Office reports that DOD has "spent hundreds of millions of dollars each year" to support its information operations outreach activities. Many of these programs are in support of operations in Afghanistan, but Military Information Support Teams (MISTs) from SOCOM also deploy to U.S. embassies in countries of particular interest around the globe to bolster the efforts of the Department of State and the U.S. Agency for International Development. Further, the geographic combatant commands are increasingly moving into this operational space.

What are your views on DOD's military information support operations and influence programs and their integration into overall U.S. foreign policy objectives?

Answer. I believe the Department of Defense must be able to influence foreign audiences in environments susceptible to the messages of U.S. adversaries. Military Information Support Teams (MIST) are trained in developing culturally appropriate messages to counter hostile information and propaganda, as well as assisting with building the capacity of partner nations to conduct these activities themselves.

Question. What is the role of DOD versus the Intelligence Community and the State Department?

Answer. The Department of Defense, like all Departments and agencies of the executive branch, takes its lead from the President, and relies heavily on the Department of State, in re-enforcing the Nation's message. I understand that Department of Defense influence activities, including those conducted by MISTs, are coordinated closely with the Embassies in the areas where they operate, both inside and outside of areas of conflict, and at times can support common efforts of other agencies. Chiefs of Mission must concur on all MIST deployments. MIST activities are fully coordinated with the U.S. country team to ensure message consistency and maintain State Department leadership in presenting the face of the U.S. overseas.

Question. How do you believe the success of these programs should be measured, especially in light of the constrained budget environment?

Answer. I understand the Department has taken significant steps to address congressional concerns related to policy oversight, budgeting, and effectiveness of information support operations and influence programs. These programs remain a special interest item for Congress, and as such must continue to be carefully managed and overseen. If confirmed, I intend to continue to be responsive to Congress on this matter, as well as to continue the Department's efforts to improve coordination of our information activities across the interagency.

CIVIL AFFAIRS OPERATIONS

Question. Civil Affairs activities carried out by U.S. Special Operations Forces in partnership with host nation personnel play an important role in developing infrastructure, supporting good governance and civil societies, and providing humanitarian assistance, including medical and veterinary services to needy populations.

In your view, does SOCOM have sufficient personnel and resources to conduct the range of Civil Affairs missions required for today's operations?

Answer. If confirmed, I will review the Civil Affairs (CA) force structure and work with the Joint Staff, the Services, and the combatant commands to determine any shortfalls and how best to address them.

Question. Civil Affairs activities are most effective when coordinated with other U.S. Government efforts, most notably those carried out by U.S. Agency for International Development.

If confirmed, how would you ensure Civil Affairs activities by special operations personnel are integrated into larger U.S. Government efforts?

Answer. If confirmed, I will meet regularly with my interagency counterparts in order to harmonize U.S. Government CA efforts as required.

Question. Military Information Support Operations (MISO) can have an amplifying effect on Civil Affairs activities by actively promoting the efforts of the U.S. military and host nation and by communicating truthful messages to counter the spread of violent extremist ideology among vulnerable populations.

If confirmed, how would you ensure Civil Affairs and Military Information Support Operations are adequately coordinated to achieve a maximum impact?

Answer. If confirmed, I would support SOCOM in its role as a joint proponent over both CA and MISO. This will enable unity of effort and the coordinated execution of CA and MISO. CA and MISO force representation at the operational and strategic levels will also remain critical in achieving a coordinated impact. At the tactical and operational level, (e.g. country teams at the U.S. Embassies where CA and MISO are working), this is accomplished as a matter of course. CA and MISO personnel receive similar training and understand that their specialties are mutually supporting.

RENDER SAFE PROFICIENCY

Question. The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is a growing and especially concerning threat to our Nation. Countering this threat through actions taken to locate, seize, destroy or capture, recover and render such weapons safe is a core activity of SOCOM.

If confirmed, how would you ensure render-safe capabilities are adequately maintained by special operations units who may currently be heavily engaged in Afghanistan and elsewhere?

Answer. The National Strategy for Counterterrorism highlights the danger of nuclear terrorism as being the single greatest threat to global security. If confirmed, I will work closely with SOCOM and Assistant Secretary of Defense for Global Security Affairs on this important issue. I will carefully monitor and assess the impact of our operational tempo on DOD's render safe capabilities and ensure that these capabilities are maintained.

Question. Do you believe additional render-safe capabilities are needed within SOCOM?

Answer. Not at this time, I believe SOCOM has the capabilities now to accomplish its render-safe mission.

SUPPORTED COMBATANT COMMAND

Question. Under certain circumstances and subject to direction by the President or Secretary of Defense, SOCOM may operate as a supported combatant command.

In your view, under what circumstances should SOCOM conduct operations as a supported combatant command?

Answer. As authorized by section 167 of title 10, U.S.C., the President or the Secretary of Defense may direct SOCOM Commander to exercise command of selected special operations missions, which may involve highly sensitive targets and circumstances. The Secretary of Defense has also designated SOCOM as the supported combatant command for planning and synchronizing global operations against terrorist networks.

TRAINING CAPABILITY

Question. What capabilities do you consider most important for effective training of special operations personnel?

Answer. The human component of SOCOM is where its strength lies and to develop our special operations personnel we must be willing to invest the necessary time and resources in advanced, realistic training. Specialized individual training, including language proficiency and development of technical skills, together with a robust joint and international exercise program, is a proven recipe for building and sustaining our cutting-edge capabilities. These are best achieved through SOF-based authorities, such as the Joint Combined Exchange Training programs, as well as other exercise programs administered by the Combatant Commands and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Question. What improvements are necessary, in your view, to enhance training for special operations personnel?

Answer. Despite steady growth in SOCOM since 2001, operational demands continue to stress the force. As we continue to transition in Afghanistan, we need to establish a sustainable rotation model for SOF that allows for deliberate training cycles for individual and unit level training in between operational deployments.

Question. What are the most significant challenges in achieving effective training of special operations personnel?

Answer. SOF are deployed at an extremely high rate around the world. Deploying persistently and for long durations results in significant experience for special operations personnel, but in many cases a focused mission may result in the atrophy of other skill sets. For example, aircrews may conduct repetitive air-land missions on a long deployment, but may not conduct a specific airdrop mission due to deployment constraints. SOCOM's development of a SOF force generation model is intended to ensure there is enough time to train in the deployment cycles to maintain proficiency in core SOF capabilities. Additionally, since most SOF missions require non-SOF support, time must be added to work closely with Service counterparts supporting SOF.

Question. What, if any, training benefits accrue to U.S. Special Operations Forces from training foreign military personnel?

Answer. SOF gain significant training benefit from training foreign personnel. These training benefits include: enhanced language proficiency, cultural awareness, real world experience conducting foreign internal defense and unconventional warfare. These activities help expose SOF to new tactics, techniques, and procedures while also encouraging the development of communication and intelligence-sharing mechanisms that enable CT operations. Training foreign military units helps build trusting relationships and fosters familiarization that in return enables our SOF to work in foreign countries with greater success and confidence.

Question. To what extent, in your view, is it appropriate for the United States to rely upon contractors for training foreign military personnel? What do you see as the primary risks and advantages in such contractor training?

Answer. SOF cannot be replaced by contractors. However, in some instances utilizing contractors may make sense and could be a viable course of action, particularly if there's a requirement for a certain technical skill not resident in our force. For example, there may not be a SOF aviator trained on a certain aircraft that is essential to a partner nation's mobility fleet. In these cases, a contract solution might be the best option to ensure an important mission is still conducted. Contractors can also fill a gap in cases when U.S. foreign policy restrictions do not permit deployment of U.S. military personnel. Contractors can also help provide logistics, administrative support, and technical/computer expertise which in turn free special operations personnel for more SOF-unique training opportunities and operational missions. DOD is obligated to maintain strong oversight over contractors, and contractors are not permitted to represent the U.S. Government.

LANGUAGE AND CULTURAL AWARENESS CAPABILITIES

Question. Deployed special operations personnel remain heavily concentrated in the Central Command theater of operations, including many who have been deployed outside of their regional area of expertise.

Are you concerned that the language and cultural skills among special operations forces have been degraded because of repeated deployments outside their regional area of expertise?

Answer. Yes. For more than a decade, 80 percent of all SOF deployments have been to the U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) area of operations. This has taken a toll on the language, regional expertise, and cultural awareness capabilities of those units deployed outside their aligned regions. SOCOM has made great strides to correct this imbalance, and I expect the trend towards greater regional alignment to continue as we move towards a transition in Afghanistan.

Question. If so and if confirmed, what, if anything, would you do to ensure these unique skills are adequately maintained?

Answer. I support SOCOM's initiative to implement higher requirements for language capability as well as to improve the training processes for its components. If confirmed, I would seek to continue to pursue several key policy issues in close coordination with SOCOM, including: native/heritage recruiting, valuing language and regional capabilities in selections and promotions, and language testing and incentives. I will also strongly encourage the continued alignment of SOF with regional areas of focus, consistent with our national strategies and aligned to the threat.

CAPABILITIES OF SPECIAL OPERATIONS AND GENERAL PURPOSE FORCES

Question. The 2010 QDR called for increased counterinsurgency, counterterrorism, and security force assistance capabilities within the general purpose forces (GPF). The Defense Strategic Guidance (DSG) of 2011 did not modify this policy. However, the Strategic Capabilities and Management Review (SCMR) released this year identifies a range of general purpose force reductions that would likely result in little or no significant or consistent capability for these missions.

What is your assessment of the QDR, DSG, and SCMR with regard to the mix of responsibilities assigned to general purpose and special operations forces, particularly with respect to security force assistance and building partner military capabilities?

Answer. I understand the Services are increasingly improving their capabilities to conduct these operations, including the Army's development of regionally-aligned forces and the Marine Corps deployment of a Special Purpose Marine Air Ground Task Force for Crisis Response (MAGTF–CR). In many cases, SOF and the GPF are working side-by-side to build the military capability and capacities of our partners around the world. I expect this trend to continue, despite budget cutbacks, given the importance our strategy places on helping our partners and allies develop assume greater responsibility for security abroad.

Question. Do you believe that our GPF need to become more like Special Operations Forces in mission areas that are critical to countering violent extremists?

Answer. The partnership between general purpose and Special Operations Forces is strong. The extensive combat employment of both forces in shared battle spaces has increased the need to coordinate our operations closely. This has resulted in a sharing of tactics, techniques, and procedures between SOF and GPF that has helped to increase the Services' capabilities to execute counterinsurgency and combating terrorism operations. The Services can continue to complement SOF's capabilities by providing those combat enablers that are not organic to SOF units or that are not available in adequate quantities. These combat enablers, including intelligence and combat service support, are vital to the success of SOF, especially in today's complex operating environment.

Question. Are there certain mission areas that should be reserved for Special Operations Forces only?

Answer. Yes. Although the Joint force has evolved significantly since 2001, and SOF and GPF are highly interoperable, they are not interchangeable. Special operations and low intensity conflict activities, as defined in title 10, U.S.C., section 167, include direct action, strategic reconnaissance, unconventional warfare, foreign internal defense, civil affairs, psychological operations, counterterrorism, humanitarian assistance, theater search and rescue, and such other activities as may be specified by the President or Secretary of Defense. SOCOM focus should remain in these defined areas of experience and expertise while integrating Service enablers as appropriate.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS ENABLING CAPABILITIES

Question. While SOCOM maintains organic enabling capabilities to support short duration missions, most special operations missions require supporting capabilities provided by the Services to be successful.

What do you believe are the greatest shortages in enabling capabilities facing Special Operations Forces?

In your view, how should the responsibility for providing supporting capabilities for special operations missions be divided between SOCOM and the Services?

What in your view are the critical supporting capabilities in each of the Services that must be preserved to minimize risk to special operations missions today and into the future?

Answer. Shortages of enabling capabilities for SOF are often similar to the shortage of high-demand enablers that challenge the rest of the deployed forces (e.g., intelligence, explosive ordnance disposal, communications, medical, security).

SOCOM's organic enabling capabilities are those that provide SOF the ability to self-sustain for short durations while maintaining the agility to deploy forces quickly in support of the combatant commanders. Longer-term support of Special Operations Forces, by doctrine, and except under special circumstances, becomes the responsibility of each Service's theater logistic command and control structure and are critical to the success of SOF.

SECTION 1208 OPERATIONS

Question. Section 1208 of the Ronald Reagan National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2005 (Public Law 108–375), as amended by subsequent legislation, authorizes the provision of support (including training, funding, and equipment) to regular forces, irregular forces, and individuals supporting or facilitating military operations by U.S. Special Operations Forces to combat terrorism.

What is your assessment of this authority?

Answer. Section 1208 authority has been a very effective tool for U.S. Special Operations Forces to leverage and enable willing partners to conduct operations to combat terrorism. Combatant commanders strongly support 1208 programs. Given the changing global threat environment, I anticipate that the need for these programs will continue to grow.

AL QAEDA

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda and its associated forces to the U.S. Homeland, U.S. interests overseas, and western interests more broadly? Which affiliates are of most concern?

Answer. The pressure exerted by the United States and its partners has isolated the core of al Qaeda. As the President has said, the remaining operatives in the al Qaeda core spend more time thinking about their own safety than plotting against us. But we now confront a less capable, but still lethal threat from geographically diversified groups affiliated with al Qaeda. The most well-known of these groups is al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP), which continues to plot against the United States. Increasingly, however, new groups of loosely affiliated extremists have also emerged, but the threat they pose to the United States is more localized.

The upheaval in North Africa and the Middle East has contributed to a permissive environment for such extremist networks to exploit. Unlike the al Qaeda core in Afghanistan and Pakistan, or even AQAP, these groups are most focused on the countries and regions where they are based. They work together through existing familial and tribal networks and focus on acting locally, as we saw in Benghazi and the BP oil facility in Algeria attacks. As we strive to work with our partners in the region, we see the political changes ushered in by the Arab Spring present challenges as well; although many of the governments in the region are friendly to our interests, they struggle to exert a monopoly of force within their own borders.

AFGHANISTAN

Question. What is your assessment of the current situation in Afghanistan? What are the weaknesses and shortcomings in the current effort to combat terrorism and insurgency in Afghanistan?

Answer. I am cautiously optimistic that we are going to accomplish our objectives in Afghanistan prior to completion of the transition. The International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) and its Afghan partners have made important security gains over the past 12 years, reversing violence trends in much of the country, and beginning the process of transition to the Afghan Government. The Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF), particularly the Afghan CT Forces such as the Afghan SOF and Special Police Units (who fall under the MOI) have been integral to this success. These units are demonstrating substantial growth in quantity, quality, and operational effectiveness. The Afghan Special Operations Forces and it's the Special Police Units have demonstrated particular competence, and are well regarded within the country.

We must remain cautious, however, as U.S. and allied forces begin to retrograde in 2014. Al Qaeda's safe havens in Northeast Afghanistan and the limited capacity of the Afghan Government remain the biggest threats to consolidating security gains to enable an enduring, stable Afghanistan that can prevent terrorist groups from using these areas to launch attacks against the U.S. Homeland. Additionally, the threat of attacks against U.S. interests within Afghanistan is likely to increase as U.S. and allied direct support to security decreases; this is a threat against which our personnel in-country must remain vigilant. Nevertheless, this partnered campaign has provided increased security and stability for the Afghan population, and the United States continues to build upon this success.

Question. Special Operations Forces in Afghanistan depend on general purpose forces for many enabling capabilities, including intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance (ISR); logistics; and medical evacuation. Admiral McRaven, Commander of SOCOM, has said "I have no doubt that special operations will be the last to leave Afghanistan" and has predicted that the requirement for Special Operations Forces may increase as general purpose forces continue to be drawn down.

If confirmed, how would you ensure adequate enabling capabilities for Special Operations Forces as general purpose forces continue to draw down in Afghanistan?

Answer. I have not yet reviewed the mission planning and analysis to form a view regarding the appropriate number of U.S., coalition, and Afghan troops necessary to fulfill key missions including force protection. I do believe that sufficient forces should be provided to do the job assigned to them, while protecting themselves. If confirmed, I will seek to ensure that all Special Operations Forces are supported by sufficient enablers, informed by military advice from the Joint Staff and the Commander, CENTCOM.

Question. In April 2012, the United States and Afghanistan signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) on the "Afghanization" of direct action counterterrorism missions in Afghanistan—reflecting the shared intention of having Afghan security forces in the lead in the conduct of such operations with U.S. forces in a support role.

What is the status of efforts to put Afghan Special Operations Forces in the lead for such operations and why do you believe such a transition is important?

Answer. In my view, both unilateral and partnered direct actions are an essential and highly effective element of our strategy to defeat al Qaeda and those that enable it in Afghanistan. Wherever possible, we should strive to maintain a reasonable degree of freedom of action within our post 2014 force structure that will allow us to achieve our objective of preventing terrorists from using Afghanistan as a sanctuary from which to attack the U.S. Homeland.

I understand that Afghanistan's highly-trained Special Operations Forces are steadily growing, and that Afghans currently play a key role in coordinating and partnering in the vast majority of these operations. Of course, direct action operations must continue to be conducted with due respect for cultural sensitivities and great care for the prevention of civilian casualties. Ultimately, the goal must be to ensure that Afghan and international forces have the capabilities and authorities necessary to achieve the transition to a post-2014 structure, while also being mindful of the goal to increase Afghan ownership throughout the transition process.

Question. The Village Stability Operations (VSO) and Afghan Local Police (ALP) programs—both U.S. Special Operations missions—have been consistently praised by U.S. military leaders as critical elements of the counterinsurgency strategy in Afghanistan.

What are your views on the value of these programs and do you believe they should be part of the long-term strategy in Afghanistan (i.e. post-2014)?

Answer. Village Stability Operations (VSO) are a critical component of the International Security and Assistance Force's (ISAF) campaign plan. VSO uses Afghan and ISAF special operations forces embedded in the community full-time to help improve security, governance, and development in more remote areas of Afghanistan where the Afghan National Security Force and ISAF have a limited presence. I understand that, since its inception, VSO has greatly expanded Afghan Government influence in key rural areas and has enabled small-scale infrastructure development. Across Afghanistan, increasing numbers of local communities are requesting to participate in this program.

The ALP, the armed local security program associated with VSO and established by President Karzai, has reportedly expanded to more than 8,000 members. ALP are empowering local communities and have proven to be a significant threat to the Taliban by denying them safe-haven, and ultimately creating the conditions for long-term stability.

PAKISTAN

Question. What in your view are the key U.S. strategic interests with regard to Pakistan?

Answer. I believe the United States and Pakistan share common interests in long-term regional stability; which includes disrupting, dismantling, and defeating al Qaeda, a durable political settlement in Afghanistan, and the safety and security of the Indian Ocean.

The National Strategy for Counterterrorism is clear in stating that the United States will only achieve the strategic defeat of al Qaeda through a sustained partnership with Pakistan. In my view, the military-to-military relationship is an important part of this partnership as it facilitates mutually beneficial counterterrorism goals. U.S. military assistance to Pakistan has helped the Pakistan Military (PAKMIL) achieve success in its counterinsurgency efforts. Despite recent setbacks in this relationship, it is important that we continue to engage our PAKMIL counterparts to reestablish and rebuild the relationship and continue achieving these successes.

Question. Does the United States have a strategic interest in enhancing military-to-military relations with Pakistan? Why or why not?

Answer. The National Strategy for Counterterrorism is clear in stating that the United States will only achieve the strategic defeat of al Qaeda through a sustained partnership with Pakistan. U.S. military assistance to Pakistan has helped the PAKMIL achieve a level success in its counterinsurgency efforts. I support efforts to increase military-to-military relations in support of counterterrorism efforts with Pakistan, as feasible.

Question. If so, what steps would you recommend, if confirmed, for enhancing the military-to-military relationship between the United States and Pakistan?

Answer. I understand unit-level relationships are strong, and I believe we should be making every attempt to ensure that our tactical and operational level leaders are able to maintain these ties however possible.

Question. What is your assessment of Pakistan's cooperation with the United States in counterterrorism operations against militant extremist groups located in Pakistan?

Answer. The internal domestic counterterrorism concerns of Pakistan are significant. I understand our current counterterrorism cooperation is good and we continue to improve the level and quality of this cooperation.

Question. In your view, how will the continued availability of safe haven for various terrorist organizations within the tribal areas of Pakistan impact our long-term strategy in Afghanistan?

Answer. Terrorist sanctuary in the tribal areas of Pakistan will continue to challenge Afghan security. Both unilateral and partnered direct actions are an essential and highly effective element of our strategy to defeat al Qaeda and those that enable it in Afghanistan, particularly in northeastern parts of the country.

Question. What is your assessment of Pakistan's efforts to counter the threat of improvised explosive devices, including efforts to attack the network, and go after known precursors and explosive materials?

Answer. I recognize the actions of the Government of Pakistan to ban the export of products utilized in the production of improvised explosive devices (IED). The improved border coordination between ISAF, Pakistan and Afghanistan and the ongoing discussions on the development of a comprehensive border security strategy are encouraging. This is a critical area for cooperation that could have had significant impact if it results in action.

SYRIA

Question. What is your assessment of the situation in Syria and its impact on the region?

Answer. Syrian President Bashar al-Asad has lost legitimacy and must step aside to enable a political solution that ends the bloodshed, and meets the aspirations of the Syrian people. I support working closely with allies, partners and multilateral institutions to achieve this goal through diplomatic and economic pressure on the Asad regime.

Hundreds, if not thousands of foreign fighters, predominantly from North Africa and Middle Eastern countries, are traveling to Syria to support the Syrian insurgency against the Asad regime. However, as history demonstrates, relationships and experience gained by these fighters could yield benefits for al Qaeda and endanger the stability of surrounding countries.

Question. What is your assessment of Jabhat al Nusra and other like-minded groups?

Answer. Al Qaeda affiliated groups, Jabhat al Nusrah and al Qaeda in Iraq, as well as other extremist groups, are a growing problem inside Syria as the security vacuum caused by the instability has allowed these groups to make modest gains. Jabhat al Nusra has sought to portray itself as a part of the legitimate Syrian opposition, while also attempting to hijack the aspirations and struggles of the Syrian people for its own malicious purposes.

Question. In your view, what is the most appropriate role for the U.S. military in assisting regional friends and allies respond to the situation in Syria?

Answer. The United States is working with our allies to achieve a peaceful and orderly political transition in Syria and to end the bloodshed as quickly as possible. Our NATO Allies are closely monitoring the situation in Syria, especially as the conflict touches on NATO's border in Turkey, and like us, are extremely concerned about the deteriorating humanitarian conditions on the ground. NATO's ultimate task is the protection and defense of NATO members. To that end, I support NATO's decision to augment Turkey's air and missile defense capabilities in order to defend the population and territory of Turkey and contribute to the de-escalation of the crisis along the Alliance's border. This includes the recent deployment of NATO Patriot batteries to Turkey from the United States, Germany, and Netherlands. I understand the administration has also been working with our international partners, including NATO Allies, to ensure that the appropriate humanitarian assistance is reaching those Syrians in need, both inside Syria and in neighboring countries. If confirmed, I would support improved coordination and information sharing on al-Nusrah Front and foreign extremist flows. I would also continue to work with Syria's neighbors, especially Jordan and Israel, to ensure their stability during this turbulent time in the region.

Question. In your view, what—if any—role should the U.S. military, including Special Operations Forces, play with respect to the situation in Syria?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that we continue planning for a variety of contingencies in order to provide the Secretary and the President with options. I will review these plans and, if necessary, I will direct additional planning on this and any other potential contingencies.

IRAQ

Question. What is your assessment of the current threat posed by al Qaeda in Iraq? How has the threat changed since the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq at the end of 2011?

Answer. The increased levels of violence in Iraq in recent months are disturbing, and are a constant reminder of the formidable challenges Iraq continues to face on the security front.

Over the past 2 years, the operational tempo of al Qaeda in Iraq has increased in part due to the destabilizing influence of the crisis in Syria. I consider the Government of Iraq an essential partner in a common fight against al Qaeda. We have an ongoing dialogue with the Government of Iraq to help facilitate its capacity to degrade and defeat the al Qaeda network and to neutralize its ability to prey on Iraqi citizens of all communities.

Question. What is your assessment of the capabilities of the Iraqi security forces to respond to the threat posed by al Qaeda and other security challenges?

Answer. Iraq no longer needs large numbers of U.S. forces to maintain its internal stability. While the Iraqi Security Forces are competent at conducting counterterrorism and stability operations, the security situation they face is serious and poses a challenge to their ultimate success. If confirmed, I would remain committed to working with the Iraqi Government to develop its military and security abilities and address regional challenges.

Question. What are the main "lessons learned" from Operation Iraqi Freedom and Operation New Dawn as they pertain to Special Operations Forces?

Answer. I believe that the United States has learned many lessons through its past operations in Iraq and its ongoing operations in Afghanistan. Some of these lessons include: the need to maximize combined operations with partner forces, the necessity of culturally attuned forces, the need for a unified U.S. Government approach, and the need for active and integrated interagency coordination.

Question. What are the lessons learned from the drawdown and post-combat operations in Iraq that should be applied to the drawdown and post-combat operations in Afghanistan?

Answer. We need to continue our relationships and capacity building for the Government of Afghanistan's efforts against al Qaeda to succeed. Information sharing, technical assistance, and enabling resources will allow our partners to effectively disrupt al Qaeda operations, especially external operations against Western interests. We have productive engagement across the globe, in many different countries that help and support our interest in protecting the Homeland and U.S. persons. We should apply all the lessons we are learning to our CT threats that will continue to emanate from Afghanistan in the future.

YEMEN AND AL QAEDA IN THE ARABIAN PENINSULA

Question. What is your assessment of the current threat posed by al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP)?

Answer. I am very concerned about the threat that AQAP poses to the Homeland. AQAP has attempted at least three attacks on the United States since December 2009, and in my view fully intends to attack again. AQAP has shown some very sophisticated and innovative techniques, such as the development of concealed explosive devices and printer cartridge bombs. AQAP is also attempting to recruit and radicalize would-be terrorists in the West through its extensive media outreach.

Question. What is your assessment of the current U.S. strategy in Yemen and what is your understanding of the role of DOD within that strategy?

Answer. The U.S. strategy to disrupt, dismantle, and defeat AQAP is a collaborative U.S.-Yemeni effort. I understand the current strategy also includes supporting the Yemeni political transition, marshaling international economic and humanitarian assistance, and building Yemen's counterterrorism capabilities through training and assistance.

As part of this whole-of-government strategy, DOD continues to collaborate extensively with Yemeni forces and remove key AQAP leadership and operatives from the battlefield. The Department's programs to train, advise, and equip Yemeni forces are also critical to long-term efforts against AQAP.

Question. Given the continuing political instability and slow progress of the national dialogue in Yemen, what are your views on the United States continuing to provide security training and assistance to Yemeni counterterrorism forces?

Answer. The Yemeni Government has made a number of gains against AQAP over the past 2 years, including driving AQAP from some of its territory in southern Yemen and enabling operations to capture and kill AQAP operatives. However, Yemeni counterterrorism capabilities remain limited, and Yemeni security forces will require continued U.S. training and assistance to enable them to effectively combat AQAP. This assistance has been and will continue to be a part of a comprehensive U.S. strategy that includes support for the Yemeni Government's reform efforts including the ongoing National Dialogue.

SOMALIA AND AL SHABAAB

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Shabaab?

In your view, does al Shabaab pose a threat to the United States and/or western interests outside of its immediate operational area?

Answer. My understanding is that successful operations by the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM) have reduced al Shabaab's freedom of movement in south and central Somalia, but al Shabaab remains a threat to the U.S. Homeland and to U.S. and western interests in the Horn of Africa. Al Shabaab leaders have claimed affiliation with al Qaeda since 2007 and formally merged with the group in February 2012. Al Shabaab has demonstrated the intent and capability to conduct terrorist acts throughout eastern Africa, and it presents a threat to the Homeland through links into Somali diaspora communities in the United States and Europe.

Al Shabaab continues to stage high profile attacks in Somalia against Western and international targets and has claimed responsibility for the attack against the Westgate Mall in Nairobi. If al Shabaab did conduct the Westgate attack, it shows al Shabaab's capability to stage complex, high-profile attacks against Western targets outside of Somalia and its ability to harm U.S. citizens abroad.

Question. What is your understanding of al Shabaab's activities to recruit foreigners, including Somali-Americans, to join their efforts?

Answer. I understand that al-Shabaab has successfully recruited foreign recruits for training in Somalia, including Somali-Americans. Although the exact numbers and nationalities of foreign fighters in Somalia remain unclear, reports indicate that several hundred foreign recruits have come to Somalia to support al Shabaab and other extremist groups since 2008. Foreign fighters threaten the Somalia National Government and the AMISOM and undermine their efforts to build a stable and peaceful Somalia.

Question. What is your understanding of the current U.S. strategy in Somalia and the role of DOD in that strategy?

Answer. U.S. policies toward Somalia support the Somali National Government and AMISOM's efforts to deliver security and basic services and lay the foundation for an enduring government. However, Somalia's historical lack of governance and sparse population make it an appealing safe haven for al Shabaab and elements associated with al Qaeda.

I understand that DOD's primary missions in the Horn of Africa are to combat terrorism and to build partner capacity to promote regional security and stability, prevent conflict, and protect U.S. interests. I believe this mission is appropriate. DOD's ultimate goal should be a fully integrated strategy under which security assistance, capacity building, operational collaboration with regional partners, and counterterrorism actions are synchronized to provide the regional security and stability that are in the interest of both the United States and our regional partners. If confirmed, I will work to ensure our strategy is developed as part of a coordinated U.S. national security policy towards the Horn of Africa, and to determine how DOD can and should best support this policy.

Question. Should the United States establish military-to-military relations and consider providing assistance to the Somali national military forces?

Answer. The United States can play a guiding and mentoring role in the development of Somalia's security sector. It is in our interest to ensure that Somalia's new government has a competent and professional military to provide security to its citizens and play a constructive role in the region. Formally recognizing the Somalia National Government earlier this year was an important first step to developing military relations. If confirmed, I will work to ensure DOD's relationship with the Somalia National Army progresses appropriately.

AL QAEDA IN THE ISLAMIC MAGHREB

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM)?

Answer. My understanding is that at this time, there is no credible evidence that AQIM is a direct threat to the U.S. Homeland. However, as seen in hostage situations in Algeria and other attacks in the region, AQIM and its associates do threaten U.S. persons and interests abroad, as well as our European Allies.

Question. In your view, does AQIM pose a threat to the United States and/or western interests outside of its immediate operational area? What capacity has AQIM demonstrated to plan and carry out actions threatening U.S. interests?

Answer. AQIM's immediate operational area includes pockets of ungoverned territory across North and West Africa. Though AQIM has not conducted an attack outside of this area, we must be proactive in denying a terrorist a safe haven throughout the region, from which direct attacks against the United States, our partners, or our interests outside of North and West Africa would be possible.

Question. In your view, what has been the impact of the recent expansion of AQIM's area of operations in northern Mali on the group's capacities and aims?

Answer. The expansion of AQIM's area of operations in northern Mali is not new. It has been a serious concern to the United States and our partners. France's operations in Mali and the regional and United Nations' peacekeeping forces have made significant progress in stabilizing the situation. We remain concerned about AQIM's freedom of action in Mali and throughout the region and will continue to work with partners, including the newly-inaugurated President of Mali, to address the threat.

OPERATION OBSERVANT COMPASS & THE LORD'S RESISTANCE ARMY

Question. Despite pressure by the Ugandan People's Defense Forces (UPDF) and efforts by U.S. Special Operations personnel to support them, elements of the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA)—including Joseph Kony—continue to operate and commit atrocities against civilian populations in the Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, and South Sudan. Some observers have identified operational concerns with this mission, including that: (1) supported forces are trying to find an elusive foe in an area roughly the size of California, much of which is covered in thick jungle; (2) technical support to U.S. forces and their UPDF partners from the defense and Intelligence Community continues to be inadequate; and (3) limitations continue to be placed on the ability of U.S. Special Operations personnel to accompany UPDF partners outside of main basing locations, thereby limiting the level of direct support they can provide.

In your view, what is the objective of Operation Observant Compass (OOC)?

Answer. Under OOC, U.S. SOF seeks to enhance the capacity of local forces to end the threat posed by the LRA. It is my understanding that U.S. military advisors are working with these forces to strengthen information-sharing and synchronization, enhance their operational planning, and increase overall effectiveness. While OOC is important in the effort to counter the LRA threat, there is not a purely military solution to this problem. The U.S. strategy to counter the LRA outlines four pillars for continuing support: increasing the protection of civilians; apprehending or removing Joseph Kony and senior commanders from the battlefield; promoting the defection, disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of remaining LRA fighters; and increasing humanitarian access and providing continued relief to affected communities. If confirmed, I would support the current U.S. policy of pursuing a comprehensive, multi-faceted strategy to help the governments and people of this region in their efforts to end the threat posed by the LRA and to address the impacts of the LRA's atrocities.

Question. Do you support the continuation of DOD's current level of support to this mission?

Answer. DOD's support to regional counter-LRA efforts helps to advance regional security cooperation and security sector reform. If confirmed, I would seek to continue the U.S. commitment to deepen our security partnerships with African countries and regional organizations by expanding efforts to build African military capabilities through low-cost, small-footprint operations.

At the same time, I would work with the Department of State and other U.S. agencies and departments to seek to strengthen the capacity of civilian bodies and institutions to improve the continent's ability to provide security and respond to emerging conflicts. I would also regularly assess and review DOD's contributions to this mission to ensure our personnel are best supporting U.S. strategic interests.

REPUBLIC OF THE PHILIPPINES

Question. What is your view of the effectiveness of U.S. assistance provided through the Joint Special Operations Task Force-Philippines to the military of the Republic of the Philippines in its fight against terrorist groups?

Do you expect the necessity for or mission of the Joint Special Operations Task Force-Philippines to change in the coming years? If so, how?

Answer. Operation Enduring Freedom-Philippines as executed by our Joint Special Operations Task Force has been very successful and serves as an excellent model for a partnership between the United States and a host nation for combatting a terrorism threat. Due to the success of this partnership, the Philippine Military is now transitioning its focus toward external threats and the security issues remaining in the south will be addressed primarily through a combination of civil and police actions.

STABILITY AND PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS

Question. In testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs (July 29, 2009), Ambassador Susan Rice, then U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations (U.N.), stated that the United States "is willing to consider directly contributing more military observers, military staff officers, civilian police, and other civilian personnel—including more women I should note—to U.N. peacekeeping operations."

What is your view on whether the United States should contribute more military personnel to both staff positions and military observers in support of U.N. peacekeeping operations?

Answer. I am supportive of contributing personnel to function in staff positions or as military observers providing the mission aligns with the national security priorities of DOD and the United States. Successful U.N. peacekeeping operations are in the core national security interest of the United States, as they generally are cost effective, reduce the burden on U.S. forces, and in many cases directly advance U.S. strategy security interests. Additionally, U.S. military personnel can have a significant, positive, impact on U.N. peacekeeping operations, and provides the United States with an opportunity to shape these missions.

Question. If confirmed, would you support identifying methods through which the DOD personnel system could be more responsive to requests for personnel support from multilateral institutions like the United Nations?

Answer. If confirmed, I would be supportive of exploring ways where the Department could more effectively respond to requests for personnel support, bearing in mind any applicable legal requirements and the current operational tempo of U.S. forces.

INTERAGENCY COLLABORATION

Question. The collaboration between U.S. Special Operations Forces, general purpose forces, and other U.S. Government departments and agencies has played a significant role in the success of counterinsurgency and counterterrorism operations in recent years. However, much of this collaboration has been ad hoc in nature.

What do you believe are the most important lessons learned from the collaborative interagency efforts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and elsewhere?

Answer. Our efforts abroad over the past decade have brought much attention to the importance of collaborative interagency efforts. The interagency collectively established procedures and relationships to successfully conduct counter-insurgency and counterterrorism operations. As we transition, the interagency must now look to maintain and improve upon the hallmarks of previous successful interagency efforts—well-informed, transparent, constant communication and collaboration at multiple levels. The interagency must ensure that all departments and agencies are operating under a common national strategic framework in support of achieving sustainable outcomes overseas and building long-lasting relationships with our global partners. With unity of effort, the interagency can implement broader foreign policies and national security objectives through fostering good governance, restoring public infrastructure, assisting economic activities, and/or enabling a secure environment through a capable, equipped armed force. If confirmed, I will continue efforts to ensure that interagency collaboration is as effective as possible.

Question. How do you believe these efforts can be improved?

Answer. One area of improvement concerns our government's approach to the immediate requirements of basic public order among foreign civilian populations when the rule of law has broken down. DOD has learned after hard experience in Afghanistan and Iraq that securing and protecting a population is not only an immediate military mission, but one that is essential for preventing insurgencies from growing and for a sustainable transition to host-country control. A whole-of-government approach is vital to assist in training foreign security forces and it takes a robust interagency effort to maintain those capacities and institutions that can educate, equip, and enable them for these missions.

Question. Should these informal and ad hoc arrangements be made more formal (i.e. through legislation, DOD Directives or Instructions, et cetera . . .) or is their ad hoc nature the reason for their success?

Answer. Formality and standardization are perhaps most important at the highest levels, where clearly prioritized objectives—or the lack thereof—can have the most positive or pernicious effects on operations and campaigns requiring the close coordination of multiple instruments of national power. The President signed a Presidential Policy Directive (PPD) on Security Sector Assistance (SSA) in April to improve the U.S. Government's collective ability to address security sector assistance issues as a shared responsibility. To this end, the PPD prescribes interagency roles, responsibilities, and collaborating principles for developing and implementing SSA activities. On the other hand, organizations and teams operating at the tactical level need maximum flexibility to achieve mission success as current requirements, driving factors, and threats continuously change. Rather than attempting to standardize the roles and relationships of tactical-level operators from different departments and agencies, we should—instead—be working to familiarize them with each other and the responsibilities of their respective departments and agencies. Operational flexibility must be buttressed with the familiarity and education derived from constant interaction, particularly interaction in the forms of joint/interagency training and education.

Question. Interagency collaboration on an operational or tactical level tends to address issues on a country-by-country basis rather than on a regional basis (e.g. international terrorists departing Mali for safe havens in Libya).

How do you believe regional strategies that link efforts in individual countries can best be coordinated in the interagency arena?

Answer. I understand that the recent security sector assistance policy guidance from the President emphasizes a "deliberate and inclusive whole-of-government process that ensures alignment of activities and resources with our national security priorities." In order to synchronize planning for these activities, I believe the interagency must link efforts in individual countries to the broader regional approach. I also believe the regional strategies developed by the members of the interagency should complement each other. Any security sector assistance strategy is largely impacted by the degree to which the interagency can plan, synchronize, and execute particular activities in a region. With prescribed interagency roles, responsibilities, and collaborating guidelines the interagency is best prepared to share plans, develop and implement programs, and monitor and evaluate the progress of our efforts in individual countries.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS PERSONNEL IN EMBASSIES

Question. SOCOM deploys personnel to work with country teams in a number of priority countries where the United States is not engaged in direct action operations, but rather trying to counter the spread of violent extremism. Their mission is to support the priorities of the Ambassador and the combatant commander's theater campaign plan against terrorist networks.

If confirmed, how would you seek to ensure the goals of special operations personnel deployed to these countries are aligned closely with those of the Ambassadors they are working with?

Answer. In your view, what is the value of these special operations personnel to their respective geographic combatant commands and the country teams they are supporting.

The sustained partnership among our geographic combatant commanders, Ambassadors, and deployed special operations forces has been strong throughout the past 12 years. Special operations personnel deployed to embassies help provide a network-based approach to assessing threats, formulating options, and improving the country team's situational awareness. They bring specialized equipment and offer significant expertise in contingency operations that augments the Ambassador's resident capabilities. If confirmed, a priority of mine will be to continue working with SOCOM, the geographic combatant commanders, and State Department colleagues to further strengthen these trusted partnerships.

DETAINEE TREATMENT POLICY

Question. Do you support the policy set forth in the July 7, 2006, memorandum issued by the Deputy Secretary of Defense stating that all relevant DOD directives, regulations, policies, practices, and procedures must fully comply with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions?

Answer. Yes. Ensuring individuals in the custody of U.S. forces are treated humanely is consistent with the applicable U.S. laws and the laws governing armed conflicts.

Question. Do you support the standards for detainee treatment specified in the revised Army Field Manual on Interrogations, FM 2–22.3, issued in September 2006, and in DOD Directive 2310.01E, the Department of Defense Detainee Program, dated September 5, 2006?

Answer. Yes.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that all DOD policies promulgated and plans implemented related to intelligence interrogations, detainee debriefings, and tactical questioning comply with the Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and the Army Field Manual on Interrogations?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that all U.S. Special Operations Forces continue to receive the necessary education and training in the standards established in the Army Field Manual, relevant DOD Directives, and other applicable requirements of U.S. and international law regarding detention and interrogation operations.

Question. Do you share the view that standards for detainee treatment must be based on the principle of reciprocity, that is, that we must always keep in mind the risk that the manner in which we treat our own detainees may have a direct impact on the manner in which U.S. soldiers, sailors, airmen, or marines are treated, should they be captured in future conflicts?

Answer. Section 1403 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2006 provides that no individual in the custody or under the physical control of the U.S. Government, regardless of nationality or physical location shall be subject to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. We hold our forces accountable to treat those we capture and detain with dignity, respect, and humanity. We do this as a matter of principal and following our moral compass. Our hope would be for our enemy to treat our personnel in a similarly humane manner, but regardless of how our captured forces are held, we will continue to maintain the high standard of treatment currently provided to detainees we hold.

DOD COUNTERNARCOTICS ACTIVITIES

Question. On an annual basis, DOD's counternarcotics (CN) program expends approximately $1.5 billion to support the Department's CN operations, building the capacity of certain foreign governments around the globe, and analyzing intelligence on CN-related matters. In a recent Government Accountability Office (GAO) report, GAO found that DOD "does not have an effective performance measurement system to track the progress of its counternarcotics activities." This is the second such finding relating by GAO to DOD CN in the last decade.

What is your assessment of the DOD CN program?

Answer. Having recently served as the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low-Intensity Conflict, I understand and appreciate the importance of DOD counterdrug activities in support of broader U.S. Government counternarcotics goals as well as the accomplishment of other key national security objectives. The DOD counterdrug program is providing critical support to our national security objectives in Afghanistan, Colombia, Mexico, Central America, Northwest Africa and elsewhere. I also recognize how the counternarcotics program supports the broader objectives of the office of the ASD for SO/LIC. If confirmed, I look forward to ensuring that these activities continue to be well-integrated into the overall SO/LIC strategy, and to ensure that they are as cost-effective as possible.

Question. Do you believe DOD's current CN strategy has proven effective in stemming the flow of illegal narcotics?

Answer. In support of The President's National Drug Control Strategy, DOD plays a key role in supporting U.S. and partner-nation counternarcotics efforts that have achieved major and sustained progress against cocaine use and distribution throughout the Western Hemisphere. According to the Office of National Drug Control Policy, DOD counternarcotics efforts have helped reduce the amount of cocaine reaching the United States, which has contributed to declines in cocaine overdose deaths, positive workplace drug tests, retail drug purity, and cocaine seizures in the United States. Through efforts such as the establishment of Joint Interagency Task Force-South and support to Plan Colombia, the Department of Defense has played a critical role in this success. Nevertheless, continued high levels of cocaine, heroin, methamphetamine trafficking, and the growing threat of synthetic drugs, continues to present an extraordinarily difficult challenge, and DOD brings unique capabilities to bear against these threats.

Question. In what ways can the effectiveness of DOD CN programs be better evaluated?

Answer. Over the past several years, the DOD CN program has made significant progress in improving its performance evaluation framework and has developed standardized operating procedures to apply across the wide range of combatant commands, armed services, and defense agencies that implement the Department's CN efforts. The performance data provided is now being used to inform policy and budgetary decisions. However, we continue to work to move beyond measuring performance based on inputs and outputs (e.g. numbers of personnel trained) rather than on the outcomes these programs are seeking to achieve. These types of evaluations can be much more difficult but would ultimately provide a better assessment of the value of these efforts.

Question. In your personal view, what role should DOD play in U.S. efforts to stem the flow of illegal narcotics?

Answer. The Department of Defense's role in U.S. counterdrug efforts is, and should continue to be, to employ militarily unique knowledge, skills, and capabilities to confront the wide range of national security threats associated with drug trafficking and related forms of transnational crime. Since the late 1980s, when DOD was designated as the single lead agency for the detection and monitoring of drug trafficking bound for the United States, DOD has provided critical counterdrug support to State, local, Federal, and foreign law enforcement partners to combat the flow of illicit drugs into our country. Narcotics and other forms of transnational organized crime also provide key financial support to terrorists, insurgents, and other threat forces, and contribute to global instability by undermining legitimate government institutions, fostering corruption, and distorting legitimate economic activity. Accordingly, DOD counterdrug efforts support the National Security Strategy, the National Drug Control Strategy, and the Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime.

DOD's efforts to build the counternarcotics capacity of partner-nation security forces serves to prevent and deter broader conflicts that could require a much more costly military intervention in the future. In today's increasingly austere budgetary environment, these programs can serve as cost-effective tools to accomplishing key national security objectives. Given the interwoven nature of threats we face today, we are increasingly seeing that the expertise, authorities, and experience of our law enforcement partners are essential to accomplishing national security objectives.

COUNTER THREAT FINANCE

Question. Identifying and disrupting key individuals, entities, and facilitation routes enabling the flow of money that supports terrorism, production of IEDs, narco-trafficking, proliferation, and other significant national security threats could have an outsized impact on confronting these threats. In August 2010, the Department issued a Counter Threat Finance (CTF) Policy Directive which recognized the CTF discipline as an essential tool in combating criminal networks and terrorist organizations and called for the integration of CTF capabilities into future force planning and the continued support to interagency partners conducting CTF operations.

What is your assessment of DOD efforts to date to institutionalize and support these capabilities?

Answer. The DOD CTF Directive, which was updated in November 2012, drives the institutionalization of CTF within the Department. Since our Nation's adversaries, from drug traffickers to terrorists, insurgents and rogue nations rely upon the flow of money to enable their activities, upsetting their financial supply lines is a proven means of disrupting threats to national security. CTF is an important capability in the Department as evidenced by our success with the Iraq and Afghanistan Threat Finance Cells. We've also seen increasing success from the CTF units established at each of the combatant commands. These CTF units coordinate across the government and work in support of the interagency to counter national security threats. Ultimately, success in CTF will depend on DOD's continued ability to integrate with, support, and complement other U.S. Government, multinational, and host nation activities. If confirmed, I will ensure DOD continues to collaborate with and support other U.S. Government departments and agencies to conduct counter threat finance activities.

Question. What is your assessment of the current ability of the Department to provide support to other U.S. Government departments and agencies conducting counter threat finance activities?

Answer. It is critical to engage all U.S. Government tools to track and halt the flow of money and to fight our adversaries' ability to access and use global financial networks. Although DOD is not the lead U.S. agency for CTF, it does work with and support other departments, agencies, and partner nations through a unique set of capabilities, including long-term planning, network analysis, and intelligence analysis. The Department's senior leadership recognizes the significance, both strategically and tactically, of a capable and robust CTF posture. I do not anticipate an immediate need to expand the support DOD is providing, but, if confirmed, I will work to ensure the Department remains fully engaged in the interagency process on counter threat finance activities and is postured to provide additional support if necessary.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to DOD's current counter threat finance efforts?

Answer. I understand the Department is in the process of examining and evaluating its counter threat finance capability, and I believe there are improvements that can be made. Principally, the Department's CTF capability should be better integrated into the policy and strategy of the Department, including COCOM theater campaign plans. I understand that the Department is conducting a capabilities-based assessment for CTF that will help identify and institutionalize these capabilities across the COCOMs, the armed services, and defense agencies. This assessment should help us to identify the full range of capabilities the Department could bring to bear in support of broader U.S. Government efforts.

Question. What do you believe is the appropriate role, if any, of SOCOM in supporting counter threat finance activities?

Answer. SOCOM is well suited to support and augment interagency efforts to counter threat finance. Experiences since 2001 have led to the development of a robust capability to analyze insurgent, terrorist, and transnational threat networks, and SOF are already integrated at many levels with interagency partners across the intelligence and law enforcement domain. SOF contributions to these agencies enables them to identify sources of insurgent, criminal, and terrorist finances; disrupt front companies; develop actionable financial intelligence; freeze and seize illicit funds; and build criminal cases.

NATIONAL STRATEGY TO COMBAT TRANSNATIONAL ORGANIZED CRIME

Question. Criminal networks are not only expanding their operations, but they are also diversifying their activities, resulting in a convergence of transnational threats that has evolved to become more complex, volatile, and destabilizing. The Director of National Intelligence recently described transnational organized crime as "an abiding threat to U.S. economic and national security interests," and stated that "rising drug violence and corruption are undermining stability and the rule of law in some countries" in the Western Hemisphere. In July 2011, the President released his Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime: Addressing Converging Threats to National Security. One of the priority action areas designated in the strategy is "enhancing Department of Defense support to U.S. law enforcement."

What is your understanding of the President's strategy to combat transnational criminal organizations?

Answer. The President's Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime applies to all elements of national power to protect citizens and U.S. national security interests from the convergence of 21st century transnational criminal threats. It declares transnational organized crime a threat to national security and includes a clear call to build, balance, and integrate the tools of American power to combat transnational organized crime, and urge our foreign partners to do the same. The end-state the U.S. Government seeks is to reduce transnational organized crime from a national security threat to a manageable public safety concern.

Question. What is your understanding of the Department's role within the President's strategy?

Answer. The President's strategy acknowledges DOD's role in providing support to law enforcement. DOD brings many unique supporting capabilities in support of broader U.S. Government efforts to combat transnational organized crime, principally through the employment of the Department's counternarcotics authorities. These capabilities primarily include military intelligence support and counter-threat finance support to U.S. law enforcement. We therefore must ensure that DOD is organized, resourced, and appropriately authorized to provide vital support to law enforcement and foreign partners to confront the national security threats associated with transnational organized crime. If confirmed, I look forward to exploring what additional U.S. support is appropriate under existing authorities.

Question. In your view, should DOD play a role in providing support to the U.S. law enforcement and the Intelligence Community on matters related to transnational organized crime?

Answer. Yes. Due to the national security implications of drug trafficking and related forms of transnational organized crime, the Department should continue to provide support to our interagency partners, including Federal law enforcement agencies and intelligence agencies. For example, DOD currently supports law enforcement through intelligence analysis at the Narcotics and Transnational Crime Support Center—an action specifically highlighted in the President's strategy. DOD also provides unique supporting capabilities including military intelligence support to law enforcement, counter threat finance, partner nation capacity building, and operational activities against threats to the United States.

BUILDING PARTNER CAPACITY

Question. In the past few years, Congress has provided DOD a number of temporary authorities to provide security assistance to partner nations.

In your view, what are our strategic objectives in building the capacities of partner nations?

Answer. In my view, the department's ability to effectively build the capacities of partner nations is a strategic necessity for the United States. It enables the Department to directly provide training, equipment, and other support to partners to encourage and enable them to share security responsibilities. This includes enabling partners to act alongside of, in lieu of, or in support of U.S. forces across the globe. In our fiscal climate, we should continue these capacity building activities so that we can achieve our defense objectives while reducing risks of sending U.S. forces into harm's way.

Question. In light of demands for defense budget cuts, how would you assess the trade-offs between providing funding for U.S. military forces and providing assistance to build the capacity of partner nations' security forces?

Answer. I believe one goal of building the capacity of a partner nation is to transform them from a security consumer to a security provider. The decision on where the trade-off is lies in the prioritization of U.S. strategic interests. We must continue to ensure U.S. military forces receive the appropriate resources, equipment, and training in order to serve effectively and be prepared to respond at any given notice. At the same it is still important to sustain engagement with key partners and building partner capacity to meet shared challenges provides a forward presence to enable operations and deter threats and, if and when necessary, to conduct future contingencies. During these uncertain times, we should continue to improve military-to-military and defense-civilian relations, while continuing to evaluate and re-calibrate the nature and substance of our relationships to ensure they are consistent with U.S. values and advance U.S. vital national interests. If confirmed, it is my aim to ensure our assistance programs to partner nations will fulfill defined strategic requirements and vitally important capability gaps that are directly in line with the President's and the Defense Secretary's strategic guidance.

Question. What is your assessment of the sufficiency of existing security assistance authorities to address the evolving nature of global security threats?

Answer. Developing partner capacity through security sector assistance is important because every one of our primary missions involves collaborating with partners to some extent. These investments buy down risk and ease the burden of U.S. forces by improving our partners' ability to provide for their own security, to contribute to larger regional and combined security efforts, or to enable U.S. operations consistent with our national objectives. In some cases, partners are better positioned than U.S. Forces to conduct security operations due to cultural affinity or political sensitivities. I understand that Congress has provided the Department of Defense security sector assistance authorities that have improved our partners' capabilities and capacity to contribute to security around the globe. There may be requirements where additional or more agile authority is needed to address emerging security challenges. If confirmed, I will look forward to working with Congress to develop appropriate legislative remedies where appropriate.

Question. What is your understanding of the purpose of the section 1206 train and equip authority? What is your assessment of the implementation of the global train and equip program?

Answer. The section 1206 authority builds capacity for counterterrorism operations and stability operations where U.S. forces are a participant. The program has been successful in responding to annual requests by the combatant commanders and Chiefs of Mission for near-term assistance to overcome critical shortfalls in partner capabilities. This includes providing training and equipment to nations deploying forces to the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) in Afghanistan. Although the 1206 program has done a great job delivering equipment, we need to do more work on assessing the effects this has on improving partner capacity over the long term. If confirmed, I will continue development of assessment metrics and work closely with Department of State colleagues to integrate 1206 capabilities into our overall foreign assistance programs for partner nations.

Question. The Global Security Contingency Fund (GSCF) was established in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012 to create a joint Department of Defense-Department of State administered program to build partner nation capacity in the areas of security and rule of law. What is your assessment of the implementation of this authority? Do you believe it's achieving its intended objectives? If not, do you believe modifications are required?

Answer. The GSCF enables the Departments to address emergent opportunities and challenges in partner's security sectors that could not be planned for but that have a direct bearing on our national security interests and do so in a more collaborative and integrated approach.

While I have not been involved in the implementation of the GSCF, I understand that the Departments of Defense and State have made significant progress towards improving joint implementation of the program and intend to incorporate a robust monitoring and evaluation framework to assess each individual GSCF project, as well as the overall program in the country of interest. If confirmed, I look forward to sharing the results of the assessment effort with Congress, and specifically this committee. I will welcome your help and continued guidance as we continue to mature the GSCF.

Question. What is the relationship of the train and equip authority to other security assistance authorities, such as counternarcotics assistance, foreign military financing, and other title 22 authorities? What should be done to ensure that the global train and equip authority does not duplicate the efforts of these other assistance programs?

Answer. U.S. security sector assistance authorities across programs are complementary, and I will strive to avoid unnecessary duplicative efforts. The counternarcotics authorities are focused on providing the Department of Defense the ability to support U.S. or other Government efforts to counter the flow of narcotics globally. If confirmed, the GSFC, section 1206, and counternarcotics authorities would fall under my purview, and I would monitor their implementation to ensure they continue to be used appropriately, and in keeping with their intent. I understand that the President issued new guidance on security sector assistance in April. If confirmed, I will strive to strengthen our capacity to plan, synchronize, and implement security sector assistance through a deliberate and inclusive process that ensures alignment of activities and resources with our national security priorities.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I will appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress when called upon to do so.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the ASD(SO/LIC)?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I will provide this committee or members of this committee accurate and appropriate information to the best of my ability when called upon to do so.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I will provide the necessary information to this committee and other appropriate committees and their staff when asked to do so.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I will provide the committee the necessary documents when appropriate and will consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing documents.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

CURRENT STATE OF GLOBAL TERRORISM

1. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Lumpkin, in remarks to the United Nations General Assembly on September 24th, President Obama stated that, "the world is more stable than it was 5 years ago." Do you believe the world is more stable than it was 5 years ago?

Mr. LUMPKIN. I agree with President Obama's assessment that the world is more stable than 5 years ago, but I also agree with his next sentence in that speech, which stated: "But even a glance at today's headlines indicates that dangers remain." The President outlined these dangers, particularly those related to global terrorism, in his address to the National Defense University on May 23. In this address he said our Nation is still threatened by terrorists—"From Benghazi to Boston, we have been tragically reminded of that truth. But we have to recognize that the threat has shifted and evolved from the one that came to our shores on September 11." I agree with the President that we will counter the threat of global terrorism through a combination of efforts, including targeted action against terrorists, effective partnership with allies and friends, and diplomatic engagement and assistance. Through this comprehensive strategy we can significantly reduce the chances of large-scale attacks on the Homeland and mitigate the threats to Americans overseas.

AL QAEDA THREAT ASSESSMENT

2. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Lumpkin, does the growth of al Qaeda in Syria indicate al Qaeda is less capable?

Mr. LUMPKIN. The continued civil war in Syria provides al Qaeda and other extremist groups with an opportunity to expand their influence and develop a cadre of experienced fighters. Al Nusrah Front has clearly grown and become more capable in Syria, but to date has not shown capability to conduct external attacks.

3. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Lumpkin, Charles Lister, an analyst for IHS Janes Terrorism and Insurgency Center, said: "Syria is the biggest al Qaeda opportunity in a decade to establish a foothold in the Middle East." Do you agree?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Al Qaeda's affiliated groups, al Nusrah Front and al Qaeda in Iraq, as well as other extremist groups, are a growing problem inside Syria. Al Qaeda has seized an opportunity created by the absence of security in Syria and become one of the most dominant opposition groups. That said their long-term viability remains in question, as does their potential to garner popular support in a post-Assad Syria. Broadly speaking, al Qaeda's message has failed to resonate with new governments in other Arab Spring countries, and I would expect the same outcome in Syria.

4. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Lumpkin, what do you think we should do about it?

Mr. LUMPKIN. The United States should continue to engage and work with our partners and allies to provide stability in the region. These efforts aim to stem the flow of foreign fighters and support the moderate factions of the opposition who represent the majority of the Syrian opposition. The United States is working with our allies to accelerate political transition in Syria and to end the bloodshed as quickly as possible. If confirmed, I will work with my interagency partners to develop recommendations for appropriate lines of operation to combat al Qaeda's foothold in the Middle East and to protect U.S. presence and interests in the region.

5. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Lumpkin, al Qaeda is clearly gathering strength in the ungoverned regions of northern and eastern Syria, the Washington Post reports that fewer than 1,000 Syrian rebels have been trained this year. As the moderate opposition grows weaker, the extremists, and al Qaeda in particular, grow stronger and Assad has less incentive to participate in the political negotiation the administration says will result in his departure. Do you think the training cited by the Washington Post is capable of altering any balance of power within Syria?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Training is and has been helpful in supporting the moderate opposition secure areas under its control. However, training is only part of the equation and we must continue to work with allied partners to attain a political solution supporting the moderate Syrian opposition. If confirmed, I will work with our partners across the interagency and with our allied partners in order to explore comprehensive, coordinated, unified approaches that will support meeting U.S. objectives in the region.

6. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Lumpkin, what strategy do you suggest to contain the growth of extremism in Syria—of Hezbollah and Shia extremism on the one hand under Assad and al Qaeda and al Nusra in ungoverned spaces on the other?

Mr. LUMPKIN. To combat the growth of extremism in Syria, a political solution to the Syrian conflict is necessary. We need to continue to explore avenues with our allied partners for supporting the moderate opposition to ultimately increase their ability to provide a legitimate government to the Syrian population. If confirmed, I will work with the interagency to develop recommendations for appropriate lines of operation to combat the growth of extremism in Syria and to protect U.S. presence and interests in the region.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN

AFGHANISTAN

7. Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Lumpkin, what force size do you recommend the United States should leave behind in Afghanistan after 2014?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Our core goal—to defeat al Qaeda and prevent its return to Afghanistan and Pakistan—remains unchanged. Over the past 4 years, due to the dedication and sacrifices of our forces, our coalition partners, and the Afghan security forces, I have been encouraged by the progress made toward our goal and believe this progress can continue beyond 2014.

The Executive Branch is reviewing options for the size of our contribution to the post-2014 NATO mission, as well as a limited U.S. counterterrorism mission, and that decision will be based on a number of factors, including:

- Conclusion of a U.S.-Afghan Bilateral Security Agreement and the NATO Status of Forces Agreement;
- Progress toward our core goal of disrupting, dismantling, and defeating al Qaeda and preventing its return to Afghanistan and Pakistan;
- Continued progress and development of the ANSF;

• A peaceful Afghan political transition centered on the elections in April 2014;
• The potential for peace talks between the Afghan Government and the Taliban.

If confirmed, one of my priorities would be to confer with our operational commanders to get their views of the situation at hand. I would then work with colleagues to provide my recommendations and participate in this review process to help senior leaders continue to make informed decisions that protects U.S. interests in Afghanistan and the region.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

AL-LIBI AND LACK OF A DETENTION POLICY

8. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Lumpkin, can you describe Abu Anas al-Libi's al Qaeda background and his potential intelligence value?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Abu Anas al-Libi is a legacy al Qaeda member likely possessing information of value to the intelligence and law enforcement communities. He has been indicted and presented in the Southern District of New York in connection with his alleged role in the attacks on our embassies in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania and Nairobi, Kenya in 1998.

9. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Lumpkin, why was the decision made to take the risk and to attempt to capture al-Libi, rather than killing him?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Wherever possible, our first priority is and always has been to apprehend terrorist suspects, and to preserve the opportunity to collect valuable intelligence that can help us protect the American people. Additionally, the prospect of gathering further operational and strategic information of other terrorist individuals, organizations, and networks is a top consideration when determining the risk mitigation strategy.

10. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Lumpkin, do you agree that when we kill—rather than capture—a high value detainee we lose valuable intelligence?

Mr. LUMPKIN. Valuable intelligence can be collected during lethal or capture operations. Capture operations allow for the ability to directly interrogate the detainee and exploit any sensitive site materials discovered with the high value target. Lethal operations, whether involving an assault force or an aerial strike, also provide opportunities for either first-hand or second-hand sensitive site exploitation of where the high value target was killed. Previous lethal operations have yielded valuable tactical and strategic information.

[The nomination of Mr. Michael D. Lumpkin was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on October 31, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on November 14, 2013.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Dr. Jamie M. Morin by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the Military Departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. I am familiar with the history of the Goldwater-Nichols Act and believe it has been extremely successful to date. The Act has benefitted over the years from periodic incremental changes to reflect lessons learned and the changing world situation. It is possible that pending analysis of potential process changes to increase headquarters efficiency and allow reductions in headquarters staff and budgets will depend on legislative changes, but those initial analyses are still underway and I have not been briefed on any recommendations.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. At present, I do not have any concrete proposals for modifications. If I am confirmed and I identify areas that I believe merit changes, I will propose those changes through the established process. I believe it is important that the Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation (CAPE) be a trusted independent advisor to the Secretary and Deputy.

DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES

Question. The Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act (WSARA) of 2009 established the position of Director of CAPE and makes that official "responsible for ensuring that cost estimates are fair, reliable, and unbiased, and for performing program analysis and evaluation functions currently performed by the Director of Program Analysis and Evaluation." The duties and responsibilities of this position are set forth in section 139c of title 10, U.S.C. and in section 2334 of such title (addressing independent cost estimation and cost analysis).

What is your understanding of the primary duties and responsibilities of the Director of CAPE?

Answer. I have read the WSARA, and in my past role as a Senate staffer closely observed the floor debate where it was adopted. Based on the law and practice in the Department of Defense (DOD) over the last 4 years, I understand that CAPE is responsible for providing unbiased, independent cost estimates for all major acquisition programs; ensuring that program cost and schedule estimates are properly prepared and considered in the Department's deliberations on major acquisition programs; providing guidance and oversight for Analyses of Alternatives (AoA) to ensure that the Department considers the full range of program and non-materiel solutions. Additionally, the Director of CAPE is responsible for leading the development of improved analytical skills and competencies within the CAPE workforce of DOD. Finally, the Director has served as a key advisor to the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense especially for the programmatic development of the Department's Future Years Defense Program.

Question. Do you believe that the Director of CAPE has the authority needed to carry out the duties and responsibilities assigned by statute?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you see any need for modifications in the duties and responsibilities of the Director of CAPE?

Answer. Not at this time. If confirmed, I will evaluate any need for modifications to the duties and responsibilities in the law.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what additional duties, if any, do you expect the Secretary of Defense to assign to you in accordance with sections 113 and 139c(b)(1)(B) of title 10, U.S.C.?

Answer. If confirmed, I expect the Secretary to assign me the duties and functions commensurate with the position, and any others he may deem appropriate.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. If confirmed as Director of CAPE, you will be the principal official in DOD responsible for cost estimation and cost analysis for acquisition programs; for review, analysis and evaluation of acquisition programs; and for related matters.

What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. I have over 10 years of experience in government as a defense analyst and executive, with particular focus on budgetary and programmatic issues. This hands-on experience built on my academic research, focused on the challenges of defense budgeting during times of budgetary decline and included significant training in quantitative and qualitative methods.

For the last 4 years, I have served as the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Financial Management and Comptroller, and in this role I oversee the operation of the Air Force Cost Analysis Agency (AFCAA). With my support and advocacy, the AFCAA team was able to expand their analytical agenda, enhance their workforce, and thereby produce rigorous cost estimates of a much wider range of Air Force programs. Additionally, AFCAA's work became much more central to the Air Force's corporate decisionmaking, resulting in much narrowed gaps between the authoritative cost estimates (whether they were done by CAPE or AFCAA) and the actual amounts funded in the Air Force budget request. This gap was $11.9 billion in fiscal year 2011 President's budget (PB) and has dropped to $1.3 billion in the fiscal year 2014 PB. We also expanded AFCAA's capability to estimate the full life-cycle costs of major weapons systems by including operating and support costs, and helped to inform an Air Force-wide effort to contain cost growth in weapons systems sustainment. Finally, during 10 months as the Acting Under Secretary of the Air Force, I was deeply immersed in the development of the Air Force program and in DOD-wide debates on efficiency efforts.

Earlier in my career, I worked as an economist and strategy consultant. I have also held fellowships from various public policy and defense think tanks and spent 4 months during graduate school in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy working on requirements and planning issues.

Question. What background and experience do you have in the acquisition of major weapon systems?

Answer. I have been a part of major acquisition decisions in both my Air Force roles, including my comptroller role as the co-signer (with SAF/AQ) of Air Force full-funding certifications for acquisition programs meeting milestone decisions. In this capacity, I have closely reviewed numerous acquisition program cost estimates and discussed their details with both cost estimators and program management. As Acting Under Secretary, I was deeply exposed to space acquisition efforts in my role as the Headquarters Air Force "focal point" for space programs. I have served as a member and a co-chair of the Air Force Council, which is the Air Force's senior-most corporate decisionmaking body, as well as a member of the Special Programs Oversight Council that reviews classified Air Force acquisition programs. As part of earning the Certified Defense Financial Manager designation, I studied the acquisition process with particular focus on financial management responsibilities. However, I have not served in a direct program management or line acquisition position.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges that will confront the Director of CAPE?

Answer. The WSARA of 2009 is intended to reform defense acquisition processes and to bring cost growth under control. The CAPE organization continues to mature in response to this legislation and Department management's need for rigorous, unbiased advice on where DOD can find necessary savings in a difficult budget environment. I have seen the organization perform exceptionally good work for the Secretary on a wide range of difficult issues, but given the scale of the budget challenges even better analytical support will be essential. I believe the primary challenge for the Director of CAPE, given the current reality of sequestration and the stark choices that the sequester compels us to make, will be to ensure independent, thorough, and insightful analysis is used to develop a comprehensive set of options for informed leadership decisions.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to immediately undertake a review of the organization and its ability to fully meet statutory requirements, with the goal to provide clear recommendations regarding changes to organizational structure and additional resource demands. I believe I will need to review the size, shape, and organization of the CAPE workforce in detail to ensure the organization is aligned to meet current and future needs. Given the significant statutory responsibilities under WSARA and the relatively limited growth of CAPE staffing since its enactment, I plan to be both an active manager of organizational resources and a strong advocate for the organization's mission. In supporting the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense in their decisionmaking on very tough resource allocation issues, I will intend to build on my relationships with the DOD senior leadership team to help form consensus on priorities and acceptable risks, informed by the best possible analysis from CAPE, the Joint Staff, the military services, and other stakeholders across the Department.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. If confirmed, what would be your working relationship with:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Director of CAPE provides the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense unbiased advice, supported by strong analysis, on how to make rational trade-offs in a resource constrained environment. The Director is the principal advisor to the Secretary for CAPE. If confirmed, I will closely interact with the Secretary to ensure his directives, goals, and themes are reflected in the programs of DOD.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I will expect to interact with the Deputy Secretary to provide unbiased recommendations concerning resource allocation, programmatic alternatives, and cost assessments.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Under Secretary of Defense (Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics) to ensure that acquisition plans and decisions are appropriately supported with accurate and unbiased estimates of the costs to develop and procure weapon systems. The CAPE director must also provide the USD(AT&L) frequent input about the viability, execution ability, and affordability of programs that support the national military strategy.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller).

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) to ensure the necessary integration of developing the Future Years Defense Program with budget plans.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Under Secretary of Defense (Intelligence) to coordinate assessments of special access and compartmented intelligence programs since the CAPE Director has oversight of all DOD resource allocation, including intelligence programs. The central importance and complexity of intelligence to our tactical, operational, and strategic operations requires regular interactions with the primary intelligence official, and his staff.

Question. The Joint Requirements Oversight Council.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work as an advisor to the Joint Requirements Oversight Council for assessing the resource requirements and programmatic risk of desired capabilities. I will not be a member of the Joint Requirements Oversight Council (JROC), however I will attend meetings and provide assessments of programs if invited. The importance of requirements to the acquisition process makes interaction with the JROC members a key imperative for the Director of CAPE.

Question. The Defense Business Systems Management Committee (DBSMC).

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure regular interaction with the DBSMC, providing assessments and advice.

Question. The Director of Operational Test and Evaluation (DOT&E).

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure a close working relationship with the Director of DOT&E, and ensure that CAPE and DOT&E freely share information and data. I believe that operational testing is critical to ensuring that weapon systems developed within DOD meet requirements, are reliable, and are cost effective. Careful consideration of operational testing results often point to weaknesses inherent in programs that impact costs, as well as pointing to considerations important for later programs.

Question. The Service Secretaries.

Answer. Service Secretaries provide critical oversight of their departments, particularly regarding plans, programs, and policies. Based on more than 4 years of experience as part of Service-level leadership, I have a good understanding of the critical role that the Services and Military Departments play in the efficient and effective functioning of the defense establishment. If confirmed, I will endeavor to establish close working relationships with Service Secretaries, working together to solve key problems relating it each Service.

Question. The Chiefs of Staff of the Military Services.

Answer. Service Chiefs have responsibilities to organize, man, train, and equip their services to meet warfighting requirements and support combatant commanders. Their title 10 responsibilities for planning and programming of resources, as well as to develop acquisition programs, ensure regular interaction between the Director of CAPE and Chiefs of Staff of the Military Services. If confirmed, I will ensure that I quickly develop close working relationships with Service Chiefs in order to jointly meet the many challenges within DOD.

Question. The combatant commanders.

Answer. The combatant commanders are the key consumers of the "products" developed in the Pentagon—the forces, programs, and other capabilities necessary to implement the National Security Strategy. If confirmed, I will endeavor to understand the needs of the combatant commanders and to advocate for the programs that support their requirements most efficiently and effectively. I will ensure that I know and react to their needs.

Question. The heads of the Defense agencies.

Answer. The Defense agencies have responsibilities to develop programs and budget to meet their requirements. If confirmed, I will be sensitive to the needs of the Defense agencies and be available to help address their challenges.

Question. The service acquisition executives.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with service acquisition executives to provide analysis, to meet the challenges of troubled programs and if required, develop alternatives to meet Defense needs.

Question. The program executive officers and program managers of major defense acquisition programs.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with program executive officers and program managers to provide analysis to help meet the challenges of troubled programs and if required, develop alternatives to meet Defense needs.

Question. The cost estimating offices of the Military Departments.

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure a close working relationship with the cost estimating offices of the Military Departments, ensuring that independent cost estimates fully represent the Service acquisition plans. The cost estimating offices of the Military Departments provide the baseline data and plans that form the basis for cost estimates for acquisition programs, and I believe that close collaboration between CAPE and the service cost estimating agencies is especially helpful when it comes to sharing analytic best practices, building robust data sets necessary for developing good cost estimating relationships, and testing critical assumptions that underpin program cost estimates.

ORGANIZATION AND STAFFING

Question. What steps do you believe you will need to take, if confirmed, to ensure that the office of the Director of CAPE is fully functional and organized in a manner consistent with statutory requirements?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to implement and refine the strategic plan to transition the organization into fulfilling its expanded roles and responsibilities in a way that both meets the intent of WSARA and the needs of the Department. I will review the organization to determine whether or not additional staff will be needed along with organizational changes to fulfill the expanded CAPE responsibilities and fully comply with the statutory requirements of WSARA.

Question. Do you see the need for any changes in the structure, organization, or reporting relationships of the office of the Director of CAPE?

Answer. Not at this time. If confirmed, I will evaluate the current structure, organization, and reporting relationships of the office of the Director of CAPE and recommend adjustments, if needed. If confirmed, I will assess these issues and recommend changes as necessary.

Question. Section 139c(d)(8) of title 10, U.S.C., requires the Director of CAPE to lead "the development of improved analytical skills and competencies within the CAPE workforce of the Department of Defense." Section 2334(f) of title 10, U.S.C., requires the Secretary of Defense to ensure that the Director of CAPE has sufficient staff of military and civilian personnel to enable the Director to carry out the duties and responsibilities of the Director under this section."

Do you believe that the office of the Director of CAPE currently has sufficient staff of appropriately qualified and trained personnel to carry out its duties and responsibilities?

Answer. It is my understanding that along with the reorganization, when Program Analysis and Evaluation transformed into CAPE as mandated by WSARA, there was a transformation of the managerial style. The goal of this managerial shift was to move to a more agile and flexible organizational structure and enable CAPE to provide the capability to carry out its duties and responsibilities without the growth in personnel that was initially expected. If confirmed, I will move rapidly to evaluate the management and staffing of CAPE and take appropriate steps to ensure that CAPE will continue to help the Department realize the program performance goals established by the President and Congress.

Question. What steps do you plan to take, if confirmed, to assess the staffing needs of your office and ensure that you have sufficient staff of appropriately qualified and trained personnel to carry out your duties and responsibilities?

Answer. If confirmed, I will review the assessments and planning done to date, and will provide further guidance as required to ensure continued adherence to WSARA.

Question. What is your view of the current staffing of cost assessment and cost estimating functions of the Military Departments and defense agencies?

Answer. The cost estimating workforce is distributed among several organizations throughout the Department. Consequently, identifying and remedying issues with the size, education experience and organization of the DOD cost estimating workforce requires an integrated and collaborative effort, with the Director, CAPE as the leader and primary advocate for the entire DOD cost community. Efforts toward that end began last year with activities to gather data on the workforce size, grade, and demographics, as well as experience and education levels. Beyond that, there is interest in measuring projected workload volume and content (i.e., what the cost assessment community is actually doing), to help assess whether scarce resources are properly focused on strategic priorities. However, these efforts are currently suspended, due to the tremendous uncertainty in the projected DOD budget and personnel levels. OSD and the Military Departments are for the most part currently operating under a hiring freeze, and face the possibility of civilian furloughs or reductions. I intend to resume these activities next year if there is more stability in the budget environment. From my Air Force experience, the Air Force is currently short approximately 200 cost estimating billets based on an Air Force manpower study.

Question. If confirmed, what role if any do you expect to play in ensuring that the cost assessment and cost estimating functions of the Military Departments and defense agencies have sufficient staff of appropriately qualified and trained personnel to carry out their duties and responsibilities?

Answer. In my view, the CAPE has made appropriate use of the expertise and resources of the Military Departments, especially in the area of data collection. The Military Departments have undertaken a long-term initiative to collect actual operating and support cost information through the VAMOSC systems. This has resulted in better quality cost estimates throughout the Department. For Milestone reviews, CAPE instituted a policy that a signed, dated service cost estimate must be delivered to the CAPE prior to delivery of an ICE which gives CAPE a point of departure and cross-check. This increased rigor has resulted in overall better cost estimates prepared by the Military Departments. Also, during the Department's Program Budget Review, CAPE teams with the Military Departments to ensure MDAP/MAIS programs are funded to the appropriate, defendable, and realistic cost estimate.

Question. In your view, has the office of the Director of CAPE been making appropriate use of the expertise and resources of the cost assessment and cost estimating offices of the Military Departments and Defense Agencies?

Answer. I am aware of the coordination between CAPE and the other DOD offices. I believe that close collaboration between CAPE and the service cost estimating agencies is especially helpful when it comes to sharing analytic best practices, building robust data sets necessary for developing good cost estimating relationships, and testing critical assumptions that underpin program cost estimates. If confirmed, I will ensure that CAPE maintains the statutorily required independence in its cost estimates, while partnering to the fullest extent possible with the cost estimating offices of the Military Departments, so that the Department receives the best possible cost estimates.

IMPACT OF SEQUESTRATION

Question. What impact do you expect sequestration (and the Secretary's directive to reduce staffing by 20 percent) to have on the organization and staffing of the office of the Director of CAPE?

Answer. I understand that the process for addressing the directive within CAPE is ongoing, and at this time, I do not have sufficient knowledge to offer a complete assessment of the impact. However, if confirmed, I will quickly evaluate the organization and staffing and take appropriate steps to ensure that CAPE's staff will remain able to meet the performance goals established by the President and Congress.

Question. What impact do you expect these measures to have on the office's ability to carry out its statutory duties, including the requirement to provide cost estimates for all major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. I do not have sufficient knowledge to offer a complete assessment of the impact at this time. However, if confirmed, I will quickly evaluate the staffing and take appropriate steps to ensure that CAPE is resourced to carry out all statutory duties.

Question. What impact do you expect sequestration to have on the costs of major defense acquisition programs (including multi-year contracts for such programs)?

Answer. Impacts will vary from program to program and will depend on many variables. It is reasonable, though, to assume some program unit costs will increase as orders are reduced to meet the funding levels mandated by sequestration. Budget instability makes it difficult to take advantage of the cost savings gained in multi-year procurement strategies. It is my understanding that CAPE and the Services are already working to identify the risks posed by sequester-level reductions. If confirmed, I will work to proactively address and mitigate issues that may arise.

Question. Do you foresee a need for new or revised cost estimates for such programs to take into account the impact of sequestration?

Answer. Yes. Cost estimates are regularly revised as programs pass through milestone events or experience significant changes. It is my understanding that sequestration impacts are currently being (and will continue to be) captured in updates to existing cost estimates.

ACQUISITION PROCESS

Question. What is your understanding of the role of the Director of CAPE in the acquisition process?

Answer. It is my understanding that the Director of CAPE plays multiple key roles in the acquisition process. The Director is responsible for providing guidance and oversight for Analyses of Alternatives to ensure that the Department considers the full range of program and non-materiel alternatives that could provide the needed military capabilities, as quickly as possible, at the lowest possible cost. The Director is also responsible, throughout the entire acquisition process, for ensuring that program cost and schedule estimates are properly prepared and considered in the Department's deliberations on major acquisition programs. The Director also is responsible for assessing whether a program is likely to achieve the desired capabilities.

Question. What is your view of the significance of sound, unbiased cost estimating throughout the acquisition process?

Answer. It is my personal view and clearly the view of the authors of WSARA, that independent, rigorous, unbiased cost and schedule estimates, paired with thorough risk assessments, are essential for effective acquisition decisionmaking and oversight. Achieving the goal of reducing cost and schedule growth in the Department's portfolio of acquisition programs requires that good cost estimates be available and considered throughout the acquisition process.

Question. What is your understanding of the role of the Director of CAPE in the requirements and resource-allocation processes?

Answer. The Director is an advisor to the Joint Requirements Oversight Council for assessing the resource requirements and programmatic risk of a desired capability. The Director is primarily responsible for executing the planning and programming phases of the Department's planning, programming, budgeting, and execution system, and coordinates closely with the Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) throughout the budget and execution stages of that process.

Question. Do you see the need for any additional processes or mechanisms to ensure coordination between the budget, acquisition, and requirements systems of DOD and ensure that appropriate trade-offs are made between cost, schedule, and performance requirements early in the acquisition process?

Answer. If confirmed, I intend to use the authorities granted by WSARA to ensure that programs are properly initiated and are postured for success. I will evaluate and recommend adjustments, as needed, to facilitate informed discussion of trade-offs.

Question. Do you see the need to review the existing processes and mechanisms to determine those parts of the process which do not contribute significant or, on balance, create adequate value to the system?

Answer. I understand that CAPE is an important participant in the acquisition process and also believe that achieving significant efficiencies in headquarters operations will require redesigning processes to be less labor intensive and time-consuming. For many acquisition programs in development or production lengthening schedules can drive significant cost increases. If confirmed, I will evaluate and look to improve CAPE's role in the DOD 5000 processes while adhering to the requirements of WSARA.

Question. Do you believe that the current investment budget for major systems is affordable given increasing historic cost growth in major systems, costs of current operations, the need for asset recapitalization, and the impact of sequestration?

Answer. Given the current reality of sequestration, all major systems budgets will need to be re-evaluated. While there are some preliminary indications that recent reforms may have helped slow weapons system cost growth, much work remains to be done. Additionally, the slow process of reducing costs for personnel and infrastructure, as laid out by the Strategic Choices and Management Review, means that investment and readiness may have to significantly decrease in the next several years in order to achieve the reduced funding levels mandated by the sequester. If confirmed, I would intend to focus attention on analyzing trade-offs between the current investment budget and the other pressures on resources across the entire Department.

Question. If not, what role do you see for the Director of CAPE in addressing this issue?

Answer. If confirmed, I will evaluate these trade-offs and recommend adjustments, if needed, and provide management direction as necessary to ensure that we have an affordable, long-term investment strategy.

Question. Many acquisition experts attribute the failure of DOD acquisition programs to a cultural bias that routinely produces overly optimistic cost and schedule estimates and unrealistic performance expectations. As Senator Levin explained at a June 2008 hearing, "contractors and program offices have every reason to produce optimistic cost estimates and unrealistic performance expectations, because programs that promise revolutionary change and project lower costs are more likely to be approved and funded by senior administration officials and by Congress."

Do you agree with the assessment that overly optimistic cost and schedule estimates and unrealistic performance expectations contribute to the failure of major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What steps if any would you take, if confirmed, to ensure that the Department's cost, schedule and performance estimates are realistic?

Answer. To ensure the Department's cost, schedule and performance estimates are realistic, it is important to have a systematic and institutionalized cost data collection throughout DOD to support estimates for current and future acquisition programs. The Defense Cost and Resource Center (DCARC) is the OSD office responsible for administrating the CSDR system, used for acquisition cost data. I understand from my AFCAA staff that this year, the DCARC continued to update and strengthen the procedures, report formats, and detailed implementation guidance for CSDR. Additionally, CAPE's annual report has found that the quality of the cost estimates for MDAPs provided by the military departments continued to improve this year due to the increase quality of data.

In addition, as part of the Department's program and budget review process, CAPE—in conjunction with USD(AT&L)—reviewed each acquisition program with significant funding changes from the latest baseline or prior year's President's budget to determine the source of the cost estimate supporting the revised program and to ensure that the program remained fully funded. This process of tracking to the approved estimate will be even more important in the future, as the Department faces significant funding constraints, resulting in more reductions to program quantities and annual procurement rates, and more pressures to budget programs at less than full funding.

Question. Do you believe that early communication between the acquisition, budget and requirements communities in DOD can help ensure more realistic cost, schedule, and performance expectations?

Answer. Yes.

Question. If so, what steps if any would you take, if confirmed, to assist in such communication?

Answer. I do not yet have a detailed plan for changes to the early-stage acquisition communication and decision process. If confirmed, I would consult with relevant stakeholders to understand the full range of considerations. I understand that CAPE has played an important role in facilitating joint deliberations between the acquisition, requirements, and PPBE processes and remain committed to improved sharing of information between these communities to enhance transparency within the Department.

Question. In the Budget Blueprint that supported the fiscal year 2010 President's budget request, the administration committed to "set[ting] realistic requirements and stick[ing] to them and incorporat[ing] 'best practices' by not allowing programs to proceed from one stage of the acquisition cycle to the next until they have achieved the maturity to clearly lower the risk of cost growth and schedule slippage."

What role do you see for the Director of CAPE in helping to ensure that the Department makes good on this commitment?

Answer. The Director is the principal official in DOD responsible for cost and schedule estimation and for assessing expected program effectiveness.

Question. Over the last several years, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) has prepared a series of reports for this committee comparing the DOD approach to the acquisition of major systems with the approach taken by best performers in the private sector. GAO concluded that private sector programs are more successful because they consistently require a high level of maturity for new technologies before such technologies are incorporated into product development programs. The Department has responded to these findings by adopting technological maturity goals in its acquisition policies.

How important is it, in your view, for the Department to mature its technologies with research and development funds before these technologies are incorporated into product development programs?

Answer. In my view it is critical for programs to reach the appropriate level of maturity before proceeding to the next acquisition stage.

Question. What role do you see for the Director of CAPE in helping to ensure that the key components and technologies to be incorporated into major acquisition programs meet the Department's technological maturity goals?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that technology risks and maturity levels are fully incorporated in the cost and schedule assessments, including Independent Cost Estimates, prepared for all major programs.

Question. DOD has increasingly turned to incremental acquisition and spiral development approaches in an effort to make cost, schedule, and performance expectations more realistic and achievable.

Do you believe that incremental acquisition and spiral development can help improve the performance of the Department's major acquisition programs?

Answer. Yes. I believe that incremental acquisition and spiral development can be one effective way to reduce acquisition risk and should be considered when appropriate across DOD's portfolio of acquisition programs.

Question. In your view, has the Department's approach to incremental acquisition and spiral development been successful? Why or why not?

Answer. I believe that the use of this approach must be considered, on a case-by-case basis, with all factors assessed and weighed in the decision. If confirmed, I will advocate for the consideration and evaluation of spiral development and incremental acquisition strategies in applicable situations. There have been improvements in the Department's acquisition performance after the enactment of WSARA. For example, the number of Nunn-McCurdy breaches has steadily decreased since fiscal year 2010, with only three significant breaches and no critical breaches in fiscal year 2013. Also, since passage of WSARA, the Analysis of Alternatives (AoA) appear to have improved due to improvements in AoA guidance, study plans, and compliance.

Question. What steps if any do you believe are needed to ensure that the requirements process, budget process, and testing regime can accommodate incremental acquisition and spiral development approaches?

Answer. I do not have sufficient knowledge to offer a detailed assessment at this time; however, I believe that these areas need to be flexible enough to support incremental acquisition and spiral development approaches.

Question. How should the Department ensure that the incremental acquisition and spiral development programs have appropriate baselines against which to measure performance?

Answer. The Department is required to prepare and measure performance against rigorous acquisition program baselines for major acquisition programs, including acquisition programs that employ these concepts. If confirmed, I will ensure realistic independent cost and schedule estimates are prepared for all major acquisition programs, including the programs that employ these concepts.

Question. The poor performance of major defense acquisition programs has also been attributed to instability in funding and requirements. In the past, DOD has attempted to provide greater funding stability through the use of multi-year contracts. More recently, the Department has sought greater requirements stability by instituting Configuration Steering Boards to exercise control over any changes to requirements that would increase program costs.

What are your views on multi-year procurements? Under what circumstances do you believe they should be used?

Answer. In general, I believe that multi-year procurement strategies can result in savings. I recognize that multi-year contracts offer the possibility of cost savings from economic order quantities. If confirmed, I will ensure the CAPE organization prepares unbiased analyses to quantify the resultant savings from the use of multi-year procurement strategies, and to assess the impact on the Department of reductions in acquisition and budget flexibilities.

Question. What is your opinion on the level of cost savings that constitute "substantial savings" for purposes of the defense multi-year procurement statute, 10 U.S.C. § 2306b?

Answer. It is my understanding that CAPE provides the estimates of the savings to be achieved by multi-year procurements, and that the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition Technology and Logistics determines if the savings are substantial. I understand that past practice and Congressional guidance has often focused on 10 percent as a cost savings threshold for justifying multi-year procurements. While 10 percent is often a reasonable standard the merits of the multi-year procurements should be considered on a case-by-case basis. I believe that such consideration should include the potential trade-off between cost savings and reductions in acquisition and budget flexibilities. Sometimes less than 10 percent savings may suffice for a program, while at other times retaining budgetary flexibility may argue for foregoing a multi-year that could generate more than 10 percent cost savings.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe that a multi-year contract should be used for procuring weapons systems that have unsatisfactory program histories, e.g., displaying poor cost, scheduling, or performance outcomes but which might otherwise comply with the requirements of the defense multi-year procurement statute, 10 U.S.C. § 2306b?

Answer. I believe multi-year strategies should be evaluated on a case-by-case basis, and past program performance is one key factor in deliberations on possible employment of multi-year procurement strategies.

Question. How would you analyze and evaluate proposals for multi-year procurement for such programs?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that proposals for multi-year procurement will be carefully and fairly assessed and then compared with acquisition strategies that do not employ multi-year procurement. In evaluating those projections, I will also ensure that multi-year savings projections are compared with actual savings achieved from historical programs.

Question. If confirmed, what criteria would you apply in assessing whether procuring such a system under a multi-year contract, is appropriate and should be proposed to Congress?

Answer. Among other issues, I would recommend including a review of all statutory and regulatory requirements and an assessment of the trade-offs between cost savings and reductions in acquisition and budget flexibilities. The specific implementation would likely vary from program to program.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, should DOD ever break a multi-year procurement?

Answer. In my view, exceptional circumstances that lead to the break of a multi-year procurement should be carefully considered case by case. Some factors that would warrant this consideration could include dramatic changes to the national security situation, significant changes to the fiscal environment facing DOD, or significant changes in the acquisition program itself.

Question. What other steps, if any, would you recommend taking to increase the funding and requirements stability of major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. If confirmed, I will take actions in concert with USD(AT&L) to ensure that independent cost estimates developed or approved by the Director are fully funded in the Future Years Defense Program, that changes to programs and cost estimates are properly tracked over time, that program cost performance is tracked consistent with the metrics specified in WSARA, and that proposed changes to programs that influence costs are fully evaluated and considered prior to implementation of changes to programs.

If confirmed, I will also recommend a careful examination of the Operations and Support costs for the Department. Optimistic forecasts of these costs sometimes contribute to instability in acquisition programs by demanding a greater percentage of available resources than originally expected, thereby undermining acquisition plans. Realistically funding these accounts, and controlling cost growth where possible, may help stabilize mid- and long-term acquisition plans.

Question. The JROC recently issued guidance which "encourages Program Managers, Program Executive Officers and Component Acquisition Executives, in coordination with the requirements sponsor, to officially request requirements relief, through the appropriate requirements validation authority, where Key Performance Parameters (KPP) appear out of line with the appropriate cost-benefit analysis." The JROC stated "[w]hile there are no limitations for requesting requirement relief, KPP relief should be considered especially appropriate in cases where significant cost savings may be achieved with marginal impact on operational capability (i.e., spending 15 percent of a program's budget to get the last 3 percent of KPP performance)."

Do you support the new JROC guidance?

Answer. Yes. I believe that if a KPP of a program is out of line with an appropriate cost-benefit analysis, it is proper to consider granting relief to correctly align the cost to the capability. Refining requirements can be highly beneficial to achieving balance between cost, schedule, and performance. Despite the benefit of reduced costs, we must ensure that we are not placing unacceptable risk on the warfighter in order to relax requirements.

Question. Are there additional changes the JROC should consider, in your view?

Answer. I am not aware of the need to make any additional changes or improvements to the JROC guidance at this time.

Question. The current acquisition system is intended to avoid fragmentation by providing that program managers report only to program executive officers, who report only to service acquisition executives, who are subject to the management and supervision of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics.

Do you support the chain of command for the acquisition system, as currently structured?

Answer. I believe the current structure of the acquisition system has helped to reduce fragmentation in the process. If confirmed, I will work with the service acquisition executives and the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics to seek out ways to further reduce fragmentation and other inefficiencies in the acquisition system.

Question. The Independent Panel charged with reviewing the 2010 Quadrennial Defense Review recommended increasing the role of the respective services in the management of acquisition programs through a system called "In-Line Management." Specifically, the recommendation called for increasing the role of the Service Secretaries in the acquisition process. In addition, the Defense Business Board's (DBB) fiscal year 2012 report titled: Linking and Streamlining the Defense Requirements, Acquisition and Budget Process also advocated for the "Military Service Chief" to have a greater role in the acquisition process.

What are your thoughts about value of increasing the management responsibilities of Service Secretaries and Service Chiefs in the acquisition process?

Do you believe adding the Service Secretaries and Chiefs of Staff to the acquisition chain of command would help address the underlying causes of cost, schedule, and performance problems in the acquisition system?

Do you believe that such a change would increase, or decrease, fragmentation of authority in the acquisition system?

Answer. To ensure optimal use of funds provided to the Department, it is critical to minimize cost, schedule, and performance problems. I believe the key to minimizing these problems is identifying the correct requirements early in the process, influenced by an unbiased, realistic assessment of their viability. The experience and insights of the Service Chiefs and Secretaries would be very helpful in discussions of requirement trade-offs and continued relevance. Based on a preliminary assessment, I support the Department's response to the DBB recommendation and I would welcome an increased role for the Service Chiefs and Secretaries in the process. If confirmed, I would expect to have more firsthand experience and develop a more fully informed view.

This would require close, early alignment between CAPE, the Services, the JROC, and the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Technology.

COST ASSESSMENT

Question. Section 2334 of title 10, U.S.C., requires the Director of CAPE to prescribe policies and procedures for the conduct of cost estimation and cost analysis for the acquisition programs of DOD.

What are the major issues that you believe should be addressed in policies and procedures for the conduct of cost estimation and cost analysis for DOD acquisition programs?

Answer. CAPE policy should enforce consistent methodologies, improve education and training, define process timelines, enhance risk analysis, and identify roles and responsibilities for cost estimating across the weapon system life cycle. Consistent cost estimating methods across departments, coupled with a trained workforce employing those methods, reduces review time, reconciliation, and associated rework which can save schedule time for acquisition programs and reduce costs.

Question. What is your view of DOD policies and procedures currently in place for the conduct of cost estimation and cost analysis for DOD acquisition programs? Are there any significant gaps that you would like to fill or significant changes that you would like to make?

Answer. The current DOD policies and procedures are being updated to codify the requirements of WSARA. CAPE is now working to complete DOD Manual 5000.04–M, Cost Analysis Guidance and Procedures. This Manual will be the primary vehicle for implementing the cost assessment provisions of WSARA. In particular, it will provide guidance to the military departments and defense agencies concerning the preparation, presentation, and documentation of life-cycle cost estimates for defense acquisition programs

Question. Section 2334(a)(6) requires the Director to conduct independent cost estimates and cost analyses for certain major defense acquisition programs and major automated information system programs at key points in the acquisition process and "at any other time considered appropriate by the Director or upon the request of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics."

In your view, does the office of the Director currently have the staffing and resources necessary to perform this function, or will additional resources be required?

Answer. If confirmed, I will quickly evaluate the staffing and resource levels and take appropriate steps to ensure that CAPE's cost assessment staff will be fully able to continue to help the Department realize the aggressive program performance goals established by the President and Congress.

Question. What is your view of the extent to which it would be appropriate to use Federally Funded Research and Development Centers or other contractors to assist in this function?

Answer. It is my understanding that the Department is still working to reestablish the capabilities of the government acquisition workforce, though the fiscal environment has curtailed much planned growth in acquisition workforce capabilities. Even with this trend, however, there are numerous functions, such as cost analysis research, that an FFRDC or a support contractor could provide to assist the Department in meeting its cost estimating requirements provided we remain compliant with the 2013 NDAA that requires each MDAP/MAIS lead cost estimator be a member of the armed forces or a full-time employee of DOD.

Question. Are there particular points in the acquisition process, other than those required by statute, at which you think that independent cost estimates and cost analyses would be appropriate?

Answer. The current acquisition process in the Department is event-driven and episodic in nature, and is driven primarily by the key milestones identified in statute. In my view, the WSARA requirements drive the Department to a model involving more continuous involvement of the cost analysis community, and this is the approach I have sought to follow with AFCAA. If confirmed, I will support a more continuous involvement of CAPE in following and tracking program performance, updating cost and schedule estimates, and in evaluating new program risks as they are identified, though I recognize that resource constraints will limit my ability to fully achieve this vision.

Question. The Director is required to "[r]eview all cost estimates and cost analyses" conducted by the military departments and defense agencies for major defense acquisition programs and major automated information system programs other than those covered by section 2334(a)(6). At certain points in the acquisition process, the Director is required to determine whether such estimates are reasonable.

In your view, does the office of the Director currently have the staffing and resources necessary to perform this function, or will additional resources be required?

Answer. If confirmed, I will quickly evaluate the staffing and resource levels and take appropriate steps to ensure CAPE's cost assessment personnel will be fully able to continue to help the Department realize the aggressive program performance goals established by the President and Congress. I recognize that all headquarters functions across DOD are under pressure to reduce staffing and resources and do not expect that CAPE will be exempt from this pressure.

Question. What is your view of the extent to which it would be appropriate to use Federally Funded Research and Development Centers or other contractors to assist in this function?

Answer. There are numerous functions, such as cost analysis research, that an FFRDC or a support contractor could provide to assist the Department in meeting its cost estimating requirements. All the Department's cost analysis agencies use contract/FFRDC support to some degree. In general, I support the current effort to enhance the government's organic cost estimating capability. However, the current fiscal pressures will likely result in reductions to both the CAPE staff and funding for the contract/FFRDC support.

Question. What action would you expect to take, if confirmed, if you were to determine that a cost estimate or cost analysis conducted by one of the military departments or defense agencies in connection with a major defense acquisition program or major automated system program was not reasonable?

Answer. If confirmed, in this situation I would direct the Deputy Director for Cost Assessment in CAPE to prepare a separate independent cost estimate and would recommend that the program not be permitted to proceed until the new independent cost estimate was completed, considered, and properly funded in the Future Years Defense Program. In my experience overseeing AFCAA, I found that situations where Program Office Estimates and independent cost estimates were likely to diverge greatly could generally be identified in advance and issues avoided by bringing analysts together to examine assumptions and models—saving time and avoiding unnecessary costs without sacrificing analytic independence.

PROGRAM EVALUATION

Question. Section 139a (d)(5) of title 10, U.S.C., makes the Director of CAPE responsible for "[r]eview, analysis, and evaluation of programs for executing approved strategies and policies, ensuring that information on programs is presented accurately and completely." Section 139a(d)(7) makes the Director responsible for "[a]ssessments of alternative plans, programs, and policies with respect to the acquisition programs of the Department of Defense."

What is your view of the significance of independent review, analysis, and evaluation of programs, and assessments of alternative programs, to the effective management of DOD?

Answer. Independent analyses and evaluation of programs help identify underlying risk in programs sometimes not seen in the service position—whether cost, schedule or performance risk. I believe that identifying these risks and offering the means to mitigate them will position the Department leadership to make informed decisions for acquiring and resourcing program plans.

Question. Do you see the need for any changes or improvements to the organization, process, or methodology used by the Department for such review, analysis, and assessments?

Answer. I am not aware of the need to make any changes or improvements to the process or methodology at this time. It is possible that additional decision support will be necessary to fulfill this, either via new staff or a reorganization of missions within existing staff. However, if confirmed, I will review the process and methodology and make recommendations for improvements, as appropriate.

Question. Does the Director of CAPE have the staffing and resources needed to carry out this function?

Answer. If confirmed, I plan to evaluate the need for the organizational changes necessary to fully comply with the intent of the legislation and the resulting impact on resources.

Question. How do you believe that the Director of CAPE should interact with Service acquisition executives, program executive officers, program managers, and other program officials in preparing independent evaluations of major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Preparation of independent evaluations of major defense acquisition programs is highly dependent on gaining unfettered access to information about the programs. I believe that it is incumbent upon the Director of CAPE to create strong relationships across the Department with service acquisition executives and other program subordinates to ensure continued access to this information. At the same time, I believe that the Director must make clear that the analyses done by the CAPE organization maintain the required independence and continue to be unbiased and reliable in developing recommendations based on the analyses.

PLANNING, PROGRAMMING, BUDGETING, AND EXECUTION SYSTEM

Question. What role do you expect to play, if confirmed, on matters relating to the planning and programming phases of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting, and Execution (PPBE) system?

Answer. I expect that I will be one of Secretary Hagel's closest advisors on all program evaluation matters. Further, I expect that I will coordinate the performance of the Program Review and ensure a close working relationship with the Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) as he coordinates the performance of the Budget Review. In my role I expect to analyze, evaluate, and provide alternative plans and programs for U.S. defense objectives and evaluate programs to ensure execution of approved strategies and policies. I anticipate performing critical reviews of requirements, capabilities, and life-cycle costs of current and proposed defense programs, with an eye toward making recommendations and identifying options for the Secretary of Defense.

Question. What role do you expect to play, if confirmed, in the preparation of materials and guidance for the PPBE system?

Answer. If confirmed, I will direct preparation for overarching guidance for the programming phase of PPBE. I also expect that I will prepare and coordinate closely with the Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) in the preparation of Fiscal Guidance to the Defense components. Further, I will expect to coordinate with the Under Secretary of Defense (Policy) in implementation of strategic policy decisions reached through processes such as the Quadrennial Defense Review. I expect that I will continue to prepare and deliver to Congress the Future Years Defense Program for DOD.

Question. Do you see the need for any changes or improvements to the PPBE system?

Answer. The PPBE system has seen virtually constant, incremental change throughout much of its recent history, but I do not have any concrete recommendations to make at this time. If confirmed I will work with other stakeholders to ensure that the PPBE system best supports the efficient and effective allocation of taxpayer dollars to the highest national security priorities of DOD.

ANALYSES OF ALTERNATIVES

Question. The Director of CAPE is responsible for the formulation of study guidance for analyses of alternatives for major defense acquisition programs and the performance of such analyses, as directed by the Secretary of Defense.

Do you believe that DOD has been making appropriate use of AoA in connection with major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. While at this time I do not have sufficient knowledge to offer an assessment of the Department's use of AoAs, I believe analyses of alternatives can identify areas where trade-offs can be made to reduce cost, schedule, and performance risk.

Question. Do you see the need for any change in the timing, content, or approach that the Department takes to analyses of alternatives in connection with major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. No. The AoAs is usually done prior to Milestone A, thereby offering the earliest opportunity to influence the acquisition strategy and program content. If confirmed, I will ensure that the AoAs continues to be updated, as appropriate, as the program proceeds to a full-rate production decision.

Question. Do you believe that the office of the Director of CAPE and other relevant components of the Department are appropriately organized and staffed to carry out effective analyses of alternatives in connection with major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Properly organized, yes. If confirmed, I will quickly evaluate and take appropriate steps to ensure that CAPE is properly organized to fulfill the responsibilities and fully comply with the statutory requirements of WSARA.

OPERATING AND SUPPORT COSTS

Question. Section 2334(e) of title 10, U.S.C., requires the Director to review and report on existing systems and methods of DOD for tracking and assessing operating and support costs on major defense acquisition programs.

Do you think that the Department is currently doing an adequate job of estimating operating and support costs for major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. I appreciate the challenges of estimating operating and support costs of increasingly complex weapon systems with ever-changing operational missions. The WSARA of 2009 requires a review of systems and methods used for developing estimates of operating and support costs. It is my understanding that a division has been established in CAPE to analyze the adequacy of systems and methods used for developing estimates of operating and support costs. If confirmed, I will review their analyses and recommend adjustments, if needed.

Question. Do you think that the Department is currently doing an adequate job of tracking and assessing operating and support costs for major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. I recognize that effective systems and methods must be in place to ensure that budgets and programs reflect the most current experience in operating and support costs. The WSARA of 2009 requires a review of systems and methods used for tracking and assessing operating and support costs. In my role as the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Financial Management and Comptroller, an Operating and Support estimating division was created in AFCAA to perform independent assessments of the operating and support costs of AF major defense acquisition programs. It is my understanding that a new division has been established in CAPE that will track and assess operating and support costs for major defense acquisition programs. If confirmed, I will review their analyses and recommend adjustments, if needed.

Question. What would be your view of a "Nunn-McCurdy"-type system for programs that substantially exceed estimates for operating and support costs?

Answer. I understand the importance of controlling the operating and support costs of our major weapon systems. I also know that this is a complicated problem—many factors contribute to increases in operating and support cost growth. I am advised that the CAPE directorate has worked to assess the feasibility and advisability of establishing some form of baseline for operating and support costs, as required in the Weapon System Acquisition and Reform Act of 2009. Increased visibility of operations and support costs is very important to enable management action to contain costs, regardless of whether a formal breech process is established. If confirmed, I will make a review of the team's progress on this question a near-term priority.

Question. What is your view on the role that the office of the Director of CAPE does and should play in assessing operating and support costs on major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. I recognize that operating and support costs are a significant driver to both major defense acquisition program costs and the department's budget. The Weapon System Acquisition and Reform Act of 2009 requires CAPE to ensure that the cost estimation and cost analysis processes of the department provide accurate information and realistic estimates of costs for acquisition programs. I understand a new division in CAPE has been established that will track and assess operating and support costs for major defense acquisition programs. I am also aware that an operating and support cost estimating guide has been written and that the Department maintains operating and support cost databases. If confirmed, I will review their analyses and activities and recommend adjustments, if needed while partnering with USD(AT&L) to make operating and support costs more visible in the milestone decision process.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Director of CAPE?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

COORDINATION OF REQUIREMENTS, ACQUISITION AND BUDGETING

1. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Morin, in a July 3, 2013, letter to Congress General Dempsey, "acknowledged the need to improve coordination among the requirements, acquisition and budgeting process." Toward that end a "quarterly leadership forum" was created which includes the Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation (CAPE) Director. General Dempsey wrote: "The Department will use this forum to ensure roadblocks are promptly addressed, continue ongoing efforts to better align requirements and acquisition processes and further engage Service Chiefs in the acquisition process." If confirmed, what do you view as your role on the forum?

Dr. MORIN. It is my understanding that the Quarterly Leadership Forum is a series of meetings dedicated to improving the coordination between the requirements, acquisition, and budgeting processes. Attendees include the leadership of the Joint Staff, the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology and Logistics, and the Director of CAPE. The explicit purpose of these meetings is to link the requirements, acquisition, and budgetary processes to help provide timely delivery of warfighter capabilities at a reasonable cost.

I have not participated in this forum in my current role, but if confirmed will look forward to taking part and contributing CAPE's insights to the group. I believe CAPE insights will include ensuring lessons are incorporated into the processes to enable the Department to more easily recognize and break through process-driven impediments to the development and fielding of warfighter capabilities in an effective and timely manner.

The ability of the DOD leadership to coordinate requirements, acquisition, and budgeting has been strained due to the enormous fiscal uncertainty facing the Department, which makes frank and timely discussions across these communities all the more important.

2. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Morin, what ideas do you think are important for the quarterly leadership forum to address and consider?

Dr. MORIN. The Quarterly Leadership Forum should include and consider the following ideas:

- The importance of streamlining process time and providing clear lines of accountability without sacrificing discipline or key oversight, and
- Expectations for rigorous cost estimates and the budgetary discipline to fully fund programs to valid estimates, in line with key priorities.

ACCURATE COST ESTIMATES

3. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Morin, to help ensure the Services submit more realistic cost estimates CAPE instituted policies requiring greater accountability from the Services. These new requirements included an obligation for the Services to produce a "signed" cost estimate to be reviewed by CAPE and to reaffirm the Services commitment to fully fund an acquisition program during the preparation of the next 5-year spending plan. What are your plans and strategies to use the capabilities of CAPE to achieve even more savings in the future?

Dr. MORIN. Following the passage of the Weapons System Acquisition Reform Act in 2009, I understand CAPE instituted new business processes for consideration of cost estimates prepared by the military services for major acquisition programs. These processes require: (1) each cost estimate be submitted and explained in a signed and dated document; and 2) financial and acquisition leaders of the military departments provide a commitment (to fully fund programs to their Service Cost Position in the next Future Years Defense Program. I have seen these new processes improve both the accountability and transparency associated with the cost estimates prepared in the Military Departments.

If confirmed, I plan to use and expand several ongoing initiatives in CAPE to improve the Department's cost estimates and achieve even greater savings in the future, specifically through guidance rewrites, increased analytical emphasis on multi-year procurements, and integration/enhancements of cost collection systems to increase analyst productivity. First, I understand CAPE is coordinating with the Military Departments to update its manual, DOD 5000.4–M, Cost Analysis Guidance and Procedures. Once complete, this update will provide authoritative guidance to the military departments and defense agencies concerning the preparation, presentation, and documentation of life-cycle cost estimates for defense acquisition programs, which in turn should increase cost analyst efficiency. The new version of DOD 5000.4–M will focus on identifying decisions that offer the opportunity to save money rather than just preparing an independent cost estimate for the program of record and stopping there.

Second, CAPE has instituted a rigorous analytic process to support certification of the savings associated with multi-year procurement contracts. This process involves direct interaction of CAPE analysts with program office personnel, within each of the military departments, as well as involvement of cost analysis personnel from the military service cost centers and the system commands, to support improved understanding of costs in support of negotiation of the best possible business contract arrangement for the Department. It also involves direct interaction of CAPE with the leadership of the prime contractor for the program, to show them the cost analyses and demonstrate the strengths and weaknesses of their initial contract proposals. This process, which was initiated 3 years ago, has resulted in expected contract savings of 10–19 percent on a number of aircraft programs that have employed multi-year contracting strategies. I understand CAPE is working on a number of other initiatives in this area, and if confirmed, I will delve further into these issues.

COLLABORATION AND PARTNERSHIP

4. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Morin, the current Director of CAPE stated in 2011 that, "we found cases where the program managers, the acquisition executives, the partners in industry and the analysts in Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation all working together—those are the places where we've seen the most success in program's going forward." Do you agree with that approach?

Dr. MORIN. I have seen multiple cases where Air Force and CAPE analysts have been able to work closely together to develop rigorous, independent estimates that are credible to program management and the acquisition executives, and which provide a good baseline for budgeting and for developing cost savings proposals. Collaboration with industry has been very helpful in developing more rigorous and consistent cost accounting standards and work breakdown structures for earned value management. Early engagement between the various responsible analysts and acquisition professionals can help streamline acquisition timelines, thereby saving cost.

5. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Morin, do you believe CAPE should be more detached in order to maintain the independence of its analysis?

Dr. MORIN. I believe that the cost assessment team has an appropriate level of independence and find their estimates to be credible and unbiased. The WSARA statute provides that the CAPE Director reports directly to the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense and can provide views directly to those leaders without the approval of any other official, ensuring that independent views on cost estimating are shared directly with top DOD leadership. Continued work is required to improve the quality of estimating and hence the accuracy and precision with which analysts are able to predict the cost of future programs.

[The nomination of Dr. Jamie M. Morin was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on October 31, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was returned to the President at the end of the first session of the 113th Congress on January 6, 2014, under provisions of Senate Rule XXXI, paragraph 6, of the Standing Rules of the Senate.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Dr. Jo Ann Rooney by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the military departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. I do not see the need to modify any provision of the Goldwater Nichols Act.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. I do not see the need to modify any provisions of the Goldwater Nichols Act.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. If confirmed, I will bring over 25 years of senior leadership experience to this position along with education credentials in finance, law, taxation, and education. In my most recent role inthe Department of Defense (DOD), I had the honor and privilege to serve as Acting Under Secretary/Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (USD/PDUSD) for Personnel and Readiness. In this role, I was responsible for Total Force Management as it relates to Health Affairs, National Guard and Reserve Affairs and Readiness and Force Management including: military personnel policies, civilian personnel policies, readiness, military, community and family programs, equal opportunity, morale, welfare, recreation and quality of life matters. I had direct responsibility and accountability for over 30,000 employees and a budget of $73 billion including: the oversight and administration of the $50 billion Defense Health Program (including all military treatment facilities (59 hospitals and 360 clinics), the Graduate Medical University and Tricare Management Activities); Defense Commissaries and Exchanges with $14.5 billion in annual sales; the Defense Education Activity which supports over 100,000 students worldwide; and the Defense Equal Opportunity Management Institute. In addition, as Acting USD/PDUSD and a member of the Secretary's senior leadership team, I actively participated alongside uniformed service leaders in the development of the Defense Strategy and defense budget for fiscal years 2013–2017. During my tenure, we worked closely with senior military and civilian leaders across all Services on the implementing the repeal of "Don't Ask Don't Tell" and the review of benefits post-repeal; completion of the Women In the Service Report; development of the initial rollout of enhanced sexual assault prevention programs and policies; directing the Dover Port Mortuary task force and response (including direct meetings with family members); ongoing improvements to the Disability Evaluation System for wounded, ill and injured servicemembers across each of the uniformed services including enhancement of programs for treatment and diagnoses for PTSD and TBI; reviewing military compensation including retirement reform; developing a new policy and program resulting in a fundamental redesign of the manner in which servicemembers are transitioned to veterans status (TAP); and developing the risk mitigation plan for the Secretary of Defense in response to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff's risk assessment. Along with the DepSecVA, I co-chaired the DOD/VA Joint Executive Council (JEC) bringing together military and civilian leadership from both departments to make decisions addressing key issues involving both agencies.

During 8 years as president of a doctoral level university, we successfully addressed serious financial challenges enabling the institution to realize significant operating surpluses after years of deficits. In addition, we developed an innovative educational model that directly impacted retention, graduation rates and student success. Various corporate and civic engagements have enabled me to lead organizations through dynamic structural and financial challenges allowing them to better serve their constituents. In particular, my work on the Jewish Hospital and St. Mary's HealthCare (JHSMH) health care system board of trustees as vice chair, allowed me to be directly involved in developing policies and procedures impacting patient care, safety, operating efficiencies and human resource policies across a system of approximately $1 billion encompassing ambulatory, community hospital and tertiary care facilities, an inpatient psychiatric hospital, comprehensive rehabilitation facility, and clinical research.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges, if any, that you would confront if confirmed as Under Secretary of the Navy?

Answer. DOD and all of the Services are facing numerous challenges brought on by over 10 years of war and fiscal uncertainty. These factors directly impact decisions on current programs, support for the warfighter and investment in future capabilities and requirements. The Navy and Marine Corps are deployed around the world engaged in the full spectrum of military missions, from direct combat operations to providing security in the maritime domain to humanitarian assistance. Determining the best balance between meeting current challenges, building a relevant and capable future force, enabling and supporting sailors, marines, their families, and the civilian workforce will pose the most significant challenges in the years ahead. It is also critical to be good stewards of taxpayer dollars, being accountable for ensuring these resources are invested wisely and efficiently. In the role as Chief Management Officer, continued improvement to program and budget development and the cost effectiveness of the acquisition program, will remain major challenges and priorities.

If confirmed, I will work tirelessly to address these issues and would work closely with DOD, Navy and Marine Corps leadership, and this committee to develop and execute strategies to address these challenges.

Question. If confirmed, how would you prioritize and what plans would you have, if any, for addressing these challenges?

Answer. In response to the strategic guidance from the President, the Secretary of the Navy, Chief of Naval Operations and Commandant of the Marine Corp have articulated clear priorities focused on people, platforms, power and partnerships. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Secretary of the Navy, senior Military and DOD leadership, and this committee to meet these challenges and priorities including but not limited to:

- Ensuring the readiness of our force to meet current and future missions around the world by recruiting, training, and retaining highly-skilled sailors and marines, and supporting the families of the servicemembers;
- supporting a diverse and well-trained civilian workforce;
- continuing to address the critical issues of sexual assault and suicides among our sailors and marines;
- maintaining a long-term ship building program that supports the needs for modernization and future capabilities, supports a robust industrial base, and is both achievable and fiscally sustainable;
- promoting acquisition excellence, stewardship, accountability and innovation; and,
- supporting the enhancement of enterprise-wide business systems to improve core business operations, performance metrics and accountability.

DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES AS CHIEF MANAGEMENT OFFICER

Question. Section 904 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008 designates the Under Secretary of the Navy as the Navy's Chief Management Officer (CMO). Section 908 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2009 requires the CMO of each of the military departments to carry out a comprehensive business transformation initiative, with the support of a new Business Transformation Office.

What is your understanding of the duties and responsibilities of the Under Secretary in his capacity as CMO of the Department of the Navy?

Answer. If confirmed, my most important duty as CMO will be to ensure that the Department of the Navy has a pragmatic and well-thought out comprehensive business transformation plan with measureable performance goals and objectives. In addition, I will continue to support a well-defined enterprise-wide business systems architecture. I would work with the DCMO to:

- Fully analyze the budget, finance, accounting, and human resource operations of the Department of the Navy in an effort to identify, streamline, and ultimately transform these related processes;
- Eliminate or replace systems whose business case analyses are determined not to be cost effective or otherwise inconsistent with business enterprise architecture transition plans;
- Monitor the implementation of the Department of the Navy's Business Transformation Plan.

Question. What background and expertise do you possess that you believe qualify you to perform these duties and responsibilities?

Answer. The Under/CMO must have a thorough knowledge of the Department of the Navy; to include the culture of both services, the government employees that support them and the industrial base. The Under/CMO should also have or develop knowledge on the way programs and budgets are developed and be a strong leader and manager. I have served as the Acting Under Secretary/Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, as well as the deputy senior policy advisor to the Secretary of Defense on recruitment, career development, pay and benefits for 1.4 million Active Duty military personnel, 1.3 million Guard and Reserve personnel, nearly 700,000 DOD civilians, and was responsible for overseeing the overall state of military readiness. In years past, I have served as chief counsel, chief operating officer, and chief financial officer in the private sector. I have taken a struggling university to financial success while simultaneously implementing major programmatic, changes, IT transformation and infrastructure upgrades and have also served in a leadership role on the board of a major hospital system undergoing significant operational and organizational change. I believe that my background along with formal education, particularly in law and finance, provides a solid foundation for the position as CMO but I accept that I must continue to learn, and will rely greatly on the knowledge and advice of the team in the Departments of Defense and Navy.

Question. Do you believe that the CMO and the Business Transformation Office have the resources and authority needed to carry out the business transformation of the Department of the Navy?

Answer. I believe the CMO and the Business Transformation Office have the resources and authority needed to carry out the business transformation of the Department. If confirmed, I would consult with the Secretary of the Navy, DOD DCMO, and DOD CMO if I discover that those resources and authorities were insufficient.

Question. What role do you believe the CMO and the Business Transformation Office should play in the planning, development, and implementation of specific business systems by the military departments?

Answer. I believe the CMO and DCMO/BTO should serve as guides and enablers for implementing sound best practices regarding planning, development, and implementation of business systems, and verify those policies are being followed appropriately in accordance with DOD guidelines. If confirmed, I would work with the DCMO/BTO to institute rigorous investment management and business process reengineering (BPR) procedures for their managed business systems.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to the statutory provisions establishing the position of CMO and creating the Business Transformation Office?

Answer. At this time, I do not believe that any changes are necessary, but if confirmed, I would consult with the Secretary of the Navy, DOD DCMO, and DOD CMO if my experience led me to believe that changes were warranted.

Question. Section 2222 of title 10, U.S.C., requires that the Secretary of Defense develop a comprehensive business enterprise architecture and transition plan to guide the development of its business systems and processes. The Department has chosen to implement the requirement for an enterprise architecture and transition plan through a "federated" approach in which the Business Transformation Agency has developed the top level architecture while leaving it to the military departments to fill in most of the detail. The Navy's business systems, like those of the other military departments, remain incapable of providing timely, reliable financial data to support management decisions.

If confirmed, what steps, if any, would you take to ensure that the Navy develops the business systems and processes it needs to appropriately manage funds in the best interest of the taxpayer and the national defense?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that the proper business case analyses and appropriate establishment and application of business enterprise architectures support the capability of providing timely, reliable data to support management decisions. I will approach this responsibility mindful of our role as public servants to be guardians of the public fiscal resources.

Question. Do you believe that a comprehensive, integrated, enterprise-wide architecture and transition plan is essential to the successful transformation of the Navy's business systems?

Answer. I am skeptical that a single architecture for an organization as large and complex as the Department of the Navy is practical or efficient. This does not mean that all standards, policies, and processes should not be established to rival the best of those in the private sector. It does mean that, if confirmed, I am accountable to ensure the appropriate analysis and process development occur to transform outdated and inefficient business operations into those that are streamlined, cost effective, and well-planned.

Question. What steps would you take, if confirmed, to ensure that the Navy's enterprise architecture and transition plan meet the requirements of section 2222?

Answer. I understand that much progress was made last year to ensure conditions for fiscal year 2014 obligation of funds for covered defense business system programs met the requirements of section 2222. The fiscal year 2014 Department of the Navy Organizational Execution Plans and Precertification memo was completed on time and met or exceeded requirements. If confirmed, I will continue that work with the Business Transformation Council, Investment Review Board, and DOD DCMO to fully meet the requirements specified in law.

Question. What are your views on the importance and role of timely and accurate financial and business information in managing operations and holding managers accountable?

Answer. Timely and accurate financial and business information is essential in managing the Department's business operations. In order to make informed decisions, the Department's senior leaders must have credible, reliable, authoritative information at the right time.

Question. How would you address a situation in which you found that reliable, useful, and timely financial and business information was not routinely available for these purposes?

Answer. If confirmed, I would prioritize their requirement to have processes in place and appropriate systems subsequently needed to produce the data.

Question. What role do you envision playing, if confirmed, in managing or providing oversight over the improvement of the financial and business information available to Navy managers?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Department of the Navy DCMO and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy Financial Manager/Comptroller to confirm the establishment of specific requirements and execute measures required to improve the quality of financial information used for decisionmaking.

AUDITABLE FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

Question. Section 1003 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010 requires the Chief Management Officer of DOD to establish a plan to ensure that DOD's financial statements are validated as ready for audit by not later than September 30, 2017. The Secretary of Defense has established the additional goal of ensuring that the statement of DOD's budgetary resources is validated as ready for audit by not later than September 30, 2014.

In your opinion, is the Department of the Navy on track to achieve these objectives, particularly with regard to data quality, internal controls, and business process re-engineering?

Answer. I do not yet have enough information to form an opinion on this matter; however, I understand that the Department has a Financial Improvement Plan and is making progress toward achieving auditable financial statements. I am aware that difficult issues must be addressed, including the valuation of major weapon systems and equipment. I have not had the opportunity to review the plan and at this time could not inform you of my confidence level that the September 30, 2014 goal is achievable.

Question. If not, what impediments may hinder the Navy's ability to achieve this goal and how would you address them?

Answer. I do not yet have enough information to form an opinion on this matter; however, I expect that the impacts of past, present and any future furlough of Government civilian personnel could serve as an impediment. Likewise, the budget uncertainty for fiscal year 2014 and beyond is a likely impediment. If confirmed, I will maintain a steady focus and commitment on all Department efforts to enable audit readiness consistent with the statutory requirement and to ensure they are built on a foundation that results in sustainable audit environments well into the future.

Question. In your view, are the steps that the Navy needs to take to meet the 2014 goal consistent with the steps that DOD needs to take to achieve full auditability?

Answer. If confirmed, I am committed to maintaining a steady focus on all Department efforts towards audit readiness and achieving clean audit opinions. This consistent focus is critical to the success of the 2014 goal. If confirmed, I will review the objectives that have been prepared and determine whether they appear to be reasonable and effective.

Question. What steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that the Navy moves to achieve these objectives without an unaffordable or unsustainable level of one-time fixes and manual work-arounds?

Answer. If confirmed, I will maintain a steady focus and commitment on all Department efforts to enable audit readiness and to ensure they are built on a foundation that results in sustainable audit environments well into the future. This includes documentation and standardization of business processes across the Navy to ensure they are traceable, sustainable, and auditable.

NAVY POLICIES REGARDING DRUG AND ALCOHOL ABUSE

Question. What is your understanding of the Navy's policy with respect to disciplinary action and administrative separation of Navy and Marine Corps personnel who have been determined to have used illegal drugs? Do you agree with this policy?

Answer. The Department of the Navy has a zero tolerance policy regarding illegal drug use and that this policy is clearly understood by all sailors and marines from the moment they enter the Service. Zero tolerance, in this context, means that sailors and marines that use illegal drugs, which includes unauthorized use or abuse of prescription drugs, will be held accountable, as appropriate, under the Uniform Code of Military Justice and unless discharged by a court-martial, subjected to mandatory administrative processing for separation from the Service. I agree with this policy.

Question. What is your understanding of the Navy's policy with respect to rehabilitation and retention on active duty of members of the Navy and Marine Corps who have been determined to have used illegal drugs or abused alcohol or prescription drugs? Do you agree with this policy?

Answer. I agree with the Department's drug and alcohol policy. I understand that while Navy and Marine Corps personnel who violate the Department of the Navy's drug policy will be appropriately punished and processed for separation, they will also be screened for counseling prior to administrative processing, and they will be given the opportunity to benefit from whatever treatment is deemed necessary.

As for alcohol abuse, I understand that the Department of the Navy's policy is to de-glamorize use, and to treat and track alcohol abuse. I further understand that there is a zero tolerance policy for driving while under the influence and that all alcohol-related vehicle incidents are reviewed prior to an officer's promotion to determine whether that officer is suitable for advancement to the next higher pay grade. Irrespective of how alcohol abuse is identified, I understand that Navy and Marine Corps personnel will be screened and provided an opportunity to participate in treatment, up to and including inpatient care.

I believe there is a duty to ensure sailors and marines receive the care they need. However, failure to obey the rules results in consequences and I fully support the Department of the Navy's policy.

Question. Do you believe that the Navy has devoted sufficient resources for implementation of its rehabilitation policies and objectives since 2001? If not, in what ways have resources been insufficient?

Answer. Based on the information I have, I believe the Navy has devoted sufficient resources for implementation of its rehabilitation policies and objectives. If confirmed, I commit to developing a more thorough understanding of the resources the Navy has devoted to these policies and objectives.

RELIGIOUS GUIDELINES

Question. In your view, do Department of the Navy policies concerning religious accommodation in the military appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs, including individual expressions of belief, without impinging on those who have different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. Based on the information I have, I am aware that all requests for religious accommodation are evaluated and given due consideration. I do believe that current Defense Department policies appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs but are balanced against the interest in avoiding adverse impact on good order and discipline as well as mission accomplishment.

Question. Under current law and policy, are individual expressions of belief accommodated so long as they do not impact good order and discipline?

Answer. Consistent with the law, every religious accommodation request requires individualized analysis. I believe that under current law and policy, religious accommodation is appropriately balanced against the interest in avoiding adverse impacts on good order and discipline.

Question. In your view, do existing policies and practices regarding public prayers offered by Navy and Marine Corps chaplains in a variety of formal and informal settings strike the proper balance between a chaplain's ability to pray in accordance with his or her religious beliefs and the rights of other servicemembers with different beliefs, including no religious beliefs?

Answer. Current law protects chaplains from being required to perform any rite, ritual, or ceremony that is contrary to the conscience, moral principles, or religious beliefs of the chaplain. I believe that current policies strike an appropriate balance for military chaplains acting in a pluralistic environment while simultaneously protecting their religious freedoms.

Question. What is your assessment of measures taken at the Naval Academy to ensure religious tolerance and respect?

Answer. I understand that the same policies implemented throughout the Navy are also instituted at the Naval Academy and that religious tolerance and respect is afforded to all midshipmen, faculty and other assigned personnel.

SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

Question. In 2012, for the fourth year in a row, there were more than 3,000 reported cases of sexual assault in the military, including 2,558 unrestricted reports, and an additional 816 restricted reports. Moreover, DOD's most recent survey indicates that the actual number of sexual offenses could be considerably higher, as 6.1 percent of active duty women and 1.2 percent of active duty men surveyed reported having experienced an incident of unwanted sexual contact in the previous 12 months. This survey has been criticized by some because its conclusions are extrapolated from an unscientific sample set and the questions asked in the survey were too imprecise. Both former Secretary of Defense Panetta and Secretary Hagel have implemented new initiatives for addressing sexual assault in the military.

What is your assessment of the Navy's implementation of the new policies for addressing sexual assault offenses?

Answer. By their new policies, some of which are unique among the services, the Navy has demonstrated that sexual assault prevention and response is a priority. It is apparent to me that the Navy is constantly looking for ways to confront this criminal activity and create an environment that facilitates prompt reporting and enables victim care. There have been a series of focused changes in place dealing directly with sexual assault prevention and response, such as: raising the disposition authority for a sexual assault case to an O–6 with special court-martial convening authority; ensuring a judge advocate is the investigating officer in an Article 32 hearing; implementing a Victims' Legal Counsel program; hiring additional Sexual Assault Resource Counselors and victim advocates; and in the case of the Navy service, hiring resiliency counselors to deploy with larger platforms, among others. However, the Navy is also addressing some of the other risk factors to include alcohol abuse. I am not yet in a position to assess the efficacy of these programs. If confirmed, I expect this assessment will be among my top priorities.

Question. What is your view about the role of the chain of command in changing the military culture in which these sexual assaults have occurred?

Answer. My view is that commanders set the tone of their command. They are responsible and should be accountable for the health, safety, and morale of their units—to include the command climate with regard to gender issues and sexual assault. Their daily actions and comments, as transmitted through the chain of command, are visible models that inform subordinates of our true standards and expectations. Local commanders and chains of command are also the most effective way to ensure compassionate support individuals in need—something hard to do from afar. While Commanders do indeed need consistent and effective policy guidance and resource support from senior leadership, no strategy to combat sexual assault, no matter how well-founded, could ever succeed without the active engagement of commanding officers and their chains of command.

Question. In your view, what would be the impact of requiring a judge advocate outside the chain of command to determine whether allegations of sexual assault should be prosecuted?

Answer. A judge advocate outside the chain of command will be looking at a case through a different lens than a military commander. I believe the impact would be decisions based on evidence rather that the interest in preserving good order and discipline. I believe this will result in fewer prosecutions and therefore defeat the very problem that I understand it seeks to address. I understand that the Response Systems Panel directed by the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 is looking at this very issue and I would appreciate the opportunity to review data and recommendations they have before considering a change of this magnitude.

Question. What is your view of the protections afforded to victims who are required to testify at Article 32, Uniform Code of Military Justice, investigations that are required before charges can be referred to a General Court-Martial?

Answer. The Rape Shield Law applies to victims at an Article 32 investigation hearing. This protects the victims from intrusive questioning about their sexual history unless there is a specific exemption. While I'm not opposed to considering changes in the Article 32 process to afford greater protections, I am concerned that as victims and witnesses receive enhanced statutory and regulatory protection there is a risk of eroding the Constitutional protections of a criminal accused. I strongly believe we must work through any substantive changes deliberately so that we are fully informed, and I believe that the panels established in section 576 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 were wise and welcome requirements of Congress that will, if given the opportunity, better inform us all.

Question. What is your understanding of the resources and programs the Navy has in place to provide victims of sexual assaults the medical, psychological, and legal help that they need?

Answer. The Navy service is adding a Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) officer at the rank of Commander or higher to major naval commands, has completed the hiring of Sexual Assault Response Coordinators and Victim Advocates and took the additional step of hiring Deployed Resiliency Counselors (DRC) to serve on larger warships. Additionally, the Navy service is in the process of implementing a Victims' Legal Counsel Program wherein Judge Advocates will help protect a victim's rights through the investigative and adjudicative stages of the military justice process.

Question. What is your view of the steps the Navy has taken to prevent additional sexual assaults? In your view, are these steps adequate?

Answer. Sexual assaults involving sailors and marines are completely unacceptable. Unfortunately, there are no simple answers. I am encouraged by the focused, persistent effort of the Department of the Navy.

Since 2009, the Department and each Service has worked to structure its sexual assault organizations. The Department of the Navy Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (DON–SAPRO) provides independent visibility and reports directly to the Secretary.

Each Service has implemented strategic plans to combat sexual assault and developed new training tools. All sailors and marines have received state-of-the-art sexual assault prevention training—most of them more than once. Both Services have adopted more aggressive campaigns against alcohol and everywhere emphasized the importance of bystander intervention to break up sexual assault situations. In doing so, they've underscored the importance of core values and the responsibility of every sailor and marine for both their own behavior and also to actively protect each other from harm.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of the training and resources the Navy has in place to investigate and respond to allegations of sexual assault?

Answer. I am aware that the Department has undertaken a number of initiatives to improve training, investigate and respond to sexual assault including: special training for Navy Criminal Investigation Service (NCIS) agents and lawyers. Over the past 1–2 years, a cadre of approximately 18 criminal investigators has been hired—in most cases, individuals with extensive civilian experience in sexual assault investigations. The Department is now supplementing that commitment with the hiring of an additional 54 new NCIS agents to focus on sexual assault investigations—specifically in response to the increased NCIS workload resulting both from policy requirements to investigate all allegations of sexual assault of any nature, and from the success of Department-wide efforts to make sailors and marines more comfortable in reporting sexual assaults in the first place. If confirmed, I would continue to monitor the effectiveness of these initiatives and seek opportunities to advance additional training and resources to address the needs in this area.

Question. Do you consider the Navy's current sexual assault policies and procedures, particularly those on confidential reporting, to be effective?

Answer. I do. Substantial increases in both restricted and unrestricted reporting during fiscal year 2012 and fiscal year 2013 in both the Navy and Marine Corps demonstrate the emphasis the Department has placed on sexual assault victim support and the intensity of training initiatives to address the problem of under-reporting. Additionally, there are reporting procedures in place that require a commanding officer to report a complaint of sexual assault to the first Flag officer in the chain of command. They also must immediately initiate a situational report that is sent to JAG and NCIS channels as well as to all echelons of leadership. This increases visibility and accountability.

I understand the concept behind restricted reporting, but I also understand the criticism. We want to hold perpetrators of sexual assault responsible, but we cannot do that unless we know who they are. I believe that with the implementation of the Victims' Legal Counsel Program and with Victim Advocates in place, the rate of unrestricted over restricted reporting will improve.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of resources in the Navy to investigate allegations of sexual misconduct and to hold perpetrators accountable for their actions? What problems, if any, are you aware of in the manner in which the confidential reporting procedures have been put into effect?

Answer. NCIS investigates all allegations of sexual assault. This requires resources. The Secretary has authorized the hiring of 54 additional NCIS agents to focus on sexual assault questions. In order for a report of sexual assault to remain a restricted report, a victim can only notify certain individuals. Once NCIS is notified of a sexual assault complaint, they must investigate whether or not the victim wants to cooperate; however, an investigation without a cooperating victim is very difficult.

Question. What is your view of the appropriate role for senior military and civilian leaders in the Secretariat, the Navy staff and the Marine Corps staff in overseeing the effectiveness of implementation of new policies relating to sexual assault?

Answer. Sexual assault prevention and response is a responsibility of leadership up and down the organization. In 2009, the Secretary of the Navy was the first to establish a Secretariat level office to oversee sexual assault prevention and response in the Department. The office is led by an SES who reports directly to the Secretary. This Secretariat-level SAPR strategy focuses on consistent top-down leadership message. Each Service also has their own program offices, led by a one-star Flag or General Officer who is responsible for overseeing the implementation of Service-specific programs.

Question. Do you believe that sexual assault continues to be an underreported crime within the Department for the Navy?

Answer. Yes—I believe it is the most under-reported crime. However, as the Navy implements new programs and policies, I would expect to see an increase in reporting as victims feel more comfortable coming forward to report these crimes.

Question. If so, what are the barriers that discourage or prevent victims from coming forward?

Answer. I believe the biggest challenges relate to the personal concerns of victims about embarrassment, self-blaming, and how victims feel they will be viewed by their friends and peers. These are tougher matters to overcome, and they ultimately depend on developing a culture that is simultaneously intolerant of sexual assault and focused on compassionate support of sexual assault victims.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps would you take to remove barriers to reporting sexual assaults?

Answer. If confirmed, I would continue to focus on victim care. Victims of sexual assault need to feel safe and cared for and that their needs are being met. As more victims feel comfortable coming forward and reporting sexual assault, we will see the barriers to reporting begin to dissolve.

Question. In response to the Annual Report on Sexual Harassment and Violence at the Military Service Academies for Academic Program Year 2011–2012, the Secretary of Defense wrote to the Service Secretaries and the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness stating: "Despite our considerable and ongoing efforts, this year's Annual Report on Sexual Harassment and Violence at the Military Service Academies demonstrates that we have a persistent problem. I am concerned that we have not achieved greater progress in preventing sexual assault and sexual harassment among academy cadets and midshipmen. These crimes and abhorrent behavior are incompatible with the core values we require of our Armed Forces' future officers. A strong and immediate response is needed."

What has the Navy done to respond the Secretary of Defense's requirement for a strong and immediate response?

Answer. I understand that the Secretary and the Chief of Naval Operations both place a personal high priority on issues at the Naval Academy. Earlier this year there was an extensive review of SAPR program structure and staffing. As a result, the Academy has assigned two civilian full-time Sexual Assault Response Coordinators (SARCs) and two civilian full-time Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Victim Advocates (VAs). The SARCs now report directly to the Superintendent and no military personnel are assigned SARC responsibilities. The VAs report directly to the SARCs. Additionally, an experienced Judge Advocate and trial attorney was recently put in place as the first Victim's Legal Counsel in the Navy.

In addition, a survey was conducted of all Midshipmen to explore perspectives on sexual assault circumstances, the command climate, and barriers to reporting. Those results helped inform the Academy's own efforts to engage local stakeholders in confronting key issues.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps will you take to address the findings contained in this report?

Answer. Senior military and civilian leaders at all levels from the Secretariat down must continue to focus on promoting environments at the Naval Academy and all commands that prevent sexual assault. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary and service leaders to maintain a focused and persistent commitment on these issues.

ANNUAL INCREASE IN RATES OF BASIC PAY BELOW THE EMPLOYMENT COST INDEX

Question. The Department has requested an across-the-board pay raise for 2014 for military personnel of 1 percent, versus a 1.8 percent rise in the Employment Cost Index (ECI) benchmark, and has indicated that in order to restrain the growth of personnel costs, similar below-ECI pay raises may be necessary over the next several years.

What is your assessment of the impact a 1 percent pay raise would have on Navy and Marine Corps recruiting and retention for 2014?

Answer. Military compensation is highly competitive today, and the President's proposed slowdown in base pay growth is not likely to cause recruiting or retention problems in the near term provided recruiting bonuses and retention pays are preserved. With the modest increases in the pay table as proposed in the President's budget, servicemembers will still realize sizable pay increases through promotions and longevity. In the current fiscal environment, there is room to slow down base pay growth, thereby helping to mitigate further cuts to force structure, readiness and modernization.

Question. What would be the impact of a 1 percent pay raise in 2015 through 2017 on recruiting and retention? What level of savings would you anticipate achieving relative to pay raises equal to ECI for those years?

Answer. Total military compensation has to be sufficient to attract and retain the numbers and quality the services need in uniform to fulfill our missions. Military compensation has gained ground relative to comparable civilian compensation in recent years. In my view, military pay raises below ECI for a few years would not cause major recruiting or retention problems for the Department of the Navy.

Assuming a comparison between a 1.8 percent ECI increase and a 1 percent proposed increase from 2015 to 2017 and that service end strengths remain at fiscal year 2014 requested levels, I would expect the Department of the Navy to save $900 million in Active Duty basic pay and $130 million in Reserve component pay for those 3 years.

END STRENGTH REDUCTIONS

Question. The Department last year laid out a defense strategy that proposes an eventual end strength of 182,000 for the Marine Corps over the next 5 years.

What is your understanding of the Marine Corps' ability to meet these goals without forcing out marines who have served in combat over the past 10 years with the implicit promise that they could compete for career service and retirement?

Answer. The promise of a military retirement is one of the solemn pledges made to compensate our servicemembers when they volunteer for a full career. However, it is time for a review of this system. I fully support Congress' establishment of the Military Compensation and Retirement Modernization Commission to conduct a comprehensive review of military compensation and retirement systems. Keeping faith with those currently serving is a high priority, and in my view the Commission and Congress should ensure that any resulting reforms protect our current servicemembers through grandfathering those who prefer the current retirement structure.

That said, I understand that the Marine Corps desires and intends to keep the faith with marines and only use voluntary separation tools. Whether these voluntary force shaping tools result in the necessary end strength will determine the need for any involuntary force shaping methods.

Question. To what extent will the Marine Corps have to rely on involuntary separations in 2014 through 2018? How will sequestration affect this?

Answer. It is not yet clear to me to what extent the Marine Corps will rely on involuntary separations during this time period. Sequestration, Continuing Resolutions, and government shutdowns exacerbate all problems.

Question. What programs are in place to ensure that separating and retiring sailors and marines are as prepared as they can be as they enter a struggling economy?

Answer. The newly redesigned Transition Assistance Program (TAP) is intended to prepare sailors and marines to make a successful transition from military to civilian life and help shorten their time to post-service employment. Transition GPS includes a 5 day common core curriculum, an option of participating in additional tailored curriculum depending on the members' follow-on interest and a "warm-handover" to government agencies and organizations that provide transitioning members with continued benefits, services and support as veterans.

The Department of the Navy's new transition program will also incorporate career readiness and transition preparation into the entire span of a servicemember's career. In the past, transition and preparation for the civilian workforce occurred late in a servicemember's lifecycle—near the point of separation. Under this new program, these concepts will be incorporated earlier as a way to ensure that the counseling, assessments, and access to resources to build skills or credentials occur at earlier stages.

Question. How fast can the Marine Corps responsibly and fairly reduce end strength while maintaining the integrity and readiness of combat units?

Answer. I am not equipped with sufficient information to effectively respond to this question at this time, but the Marine Corps will almost certainly need a balanced program of reduced accessions and lower retention to achieve the proposed strength reductions while maintaining readiness.

Question. If sequestration continues through 2018, what will be the impact on the Active Duty and Reserve end strengths of the Navy and Marine Corps, and how would the mix between the Active and Reserve Forces be affected?

Answer. In the case of the Marine Corps, I understand that the Commandant's adjusted end strength goal of 182,100 marines by the end of fiscal year 2016 assumes risk. If sequestration continues, I expect the Marine Corps will be required to further reduce end strength and will put the Nation's ability to respond to crisis at risk. In the case of the Navy, Active and Reserve end strength is linked to force structure and would almost certainly decrease as force structure changes are made. As to the planned mix of Active and Reserve Forces, I am not yet equipped with the information necessary to respond to this question but as DOD looks to slow the growth of personnel costs this will be an area that I expect would be evaluate carefully.

Question. What is your understanding of the need for additional force shaping tools requiring legislation beyond what Congress has provided the past 2 years?

Answer. I am unaware of a need for additional force shaping tools beyond what Congress has provided over the past 2 years.

NAVY AND MARINE CORPS RECRUITING AND RETENTION

Question. The retention of quality sailors and marines, officer and enlisted, Active Duty and Reserve, is vital to the Department of the Navy.

How would you evaluate the status of the Navy and Marine Corps in successfully recruiting and retaining high caliber personnel?

Answer. I understand that both services have met their recruiting goals in recent years and have brought in exceptionally high quality cohorts of new sailors and marines. I understand that recruit quality has been so high that attrition of new recruits has been at record lows.

Question. How would you evaluate the recruiting and retention of uniformed and civilian health care professionals?

Answer. Healthcare professionals are always challenging to recruit, but I understand that the Active component Navy has met both recruiting and retention goals this year.

Question. What initiatives would you take, if confirmed, to further improve Navy and Marine Corps recruiting and retention, in both the Active and Reserve components, including health care professionals?

Answer. If confirmed, I will be mindful of the effects of sequestration on efforts to recruit and retain the high-quality sailors and marines in our All-Volunteer Force and will recommend any necessary improvements after consultation with the Service Chiefs or their designees, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Manpower and Reserve Affairs and the Surgeon General.

SEQUESTRATION

Question. What would be the impact on the Navy and Marine Corps if another round of sequestration were to take effect during fiscal year 2014?

Answer. Sequestration in fiscal year 2014, particularly when combined with the absence of an appropriation and the restrictions associated with a potential Continuing Resolution, will reduce service readiness in the near-term and continue to negatively impact programs in the long term. I would expect reductions to operations and maintenance funding to impact the Navy's near-term forward presence and depot maintenance and training, which will in turn, affect future operational rotations. In investment accounts, I expect tradeoffs and reduced quantities of ships, aircraft, and weapon systems will likely be required.

Question. What would be the specific impact on Navy and Marine Corps civilian and military personnel; on family programs; on morale, welfare and recreation programs; and on the delivery of health care to service personnel, retirees, and their families?

Answer. Even though military personnel accounts are exempt from sequestration many of these programs are funded from the Operations and Maintenance Accounts. I am not aware of specific impacts at this time but I would expect there will be negative impacts.

SUICIDE PREVENTION

Question. The number of suicides in the total Navy and Marine Corps continues to be of concern to the committee.

If confirmed, what role would you play in shaping suicide prevention programs and policies for the Department of the Navy to prevent suicides and increase the resiliency of service personnel and their families?

Answer. If confirmed, I would commit to leading on this issue and to advance the Department's goal to reduce the number of Navy and Marine Corps suicides by accelerating reviews of successful initiatives both inside and outside the Services to incorporate evidence-based best practices.

MORALE, WELFARE, AND RECREATION

Question. Morale, Welfare, and Recreation (MWR) programs are critical to enhancement of military life for members and their families, especially in light of frequent and sometimes lengthy deployments. These programs must be relevant and attractive to all eligible users, including Active Duty and Reserve personnel, retirees, and families.

What challenges do you foresee in sustaining Navy MWR programs, particularly in view of the current fiscal environment, and if confirmed, are there any improvements you would seek to achieve?

Answer. Sustaining Navy and Marine Corps MWR programs will be challenged by reductions in appropriated fund support to those MWR programs not funded fully by non-appropriated funding, and the changing needs of sailors, marines, and their families based on the fluctuating fiscal environment and any future reductions in end strength. If confirmed, I will assess whether there are ways to improve the sustainment of our most important MWR programs.

FAMILY READINESS AND SUPPORT

Question. Military members and their families in both the Active and Reserve components have made, and continue to make, tremendous sacrifices in support of operational deployments. Senior military leaders have warned of concerns among military families as a result of the stress of deployments and the separations that go with them.

What do you consider to be the most important family readiness issues for Navy and Marine Corps personnel and their families, and, if confirmed, how would you ensure that family readiness needs are addressed and adequately resourced?

Answer. I recognize our sailors and marines can achieve and maintain their peak readiness only when their families are also prepared to handle the mental and emotional rigors of military service.

In my view, continuing to prepare and support our sailors, marines, and their families before, during, and after deployment to promote positive adjustment to deployment, family separation, and family reunion remains one of our most important family readiness issues. By continuing to emphasize the importance of this subset of family readiness programs, the Department can assist commanding officers, sailors, marines, and their families to manage the demands of the naval service lifestyle of ongoing deployments and increasing operational tempo.

Question. How would you address these family readiness needs in light of global rebasing, deployments, and future reductions in end strength?

Answer. Global rebasing, increasing operational tempo, and future reductions in end strength will necessitate continuous assessment of the needed level and nature of services to ensure the health and well-being of our sailors, marines, and their families. Annual assessments of family support programs conducted by the Services allow the identification of changing needs and adjustment and realignment of services as necessary.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure support is provided to Reserve component families related to mobilization, deployment and family readiness, as well as to active duty families who do not reside near a military installation?

Answer. A number of information and referral services such as Military OneSource and Military and Family Life Counseling Services are available to both Active Duty and Reserve sailors, marines, and family members and should continue to be resources for servicemembers and family members.

Question. If confirmed, what steps will you take to sustain Navy and Marine Corps family support, given current fiscal constraints?

Answer. If confirmed I would evaluate the balance of appropriated and non-appropriated funding levels for different programs and ensure the services have identified improved effectiveness, efficiency, and economy in the delivery of programs to include exploration of shared services or similar models for common support with the other military departments as opportunities to provide family readiness programs at needed service levels.

SYSTEMS AND SUPPORT FOR WOUNDED WARRIORS

Question. Servicemembers who are wounded or injured in combat operation deserve the highest priority from the Navy, Marine Corps, and the Federal Government for support services, healing and recuperation, rehabilitation, evaluation for return to duty, successful transition from Active Duty if required, and continuing support beyond retirement or discharge. Despite the enactment of legislation and renewed emphasis over the past several years, many challenges remain.

What is your assessment of the progress made to date by the Department of the Navy to improve the care, management, and transition of seriously ill and injured sailors and marines and their families?

Answer. I understand that the Department of the Navy is currently meeting the Integrated Disability Evaluation System (IDES) goal of 295 days, but the Department should continue to improve system performance by leveraging available IT systems that increase process visibility and active leadership to better manage workflow.

Question. What are the strengths upon which continued progress should be based?

Answer. For the serious wounded, ill, and injured, a smooth transition from the Department of the Navy to the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) remains the most important goal. The Department of the Navy is presently coordinating with the DOD–VA interagency task force to better prepare sailors and marines to make a successful transition from military to civilian life and Veteran status and progress here should continue.

Question. What are the weaknesses that need to be corrected?

Answer. As fiscal resources become increasingly limited it will become more difficult to maintain education, training, and certification for Physical Evaluation Board Liaison Officers, physicians and IDES staff—each of which are critical components to maintaining timeliness and program quality. Challenges remain to improve/develop viable IT solutions that minimize staff workload while delivering the data needed to avoid process delays and post-service benefit gaps.

Question. If confirmed, are there additional strategies and resources that you would pursue to increase the Navy's and Marine Corps' support for wounded personnel and their families, and to monitor their progress in returning to duty or to civilian life?

Answer. To meet the presidential directive to develop a comprehensive plan for a "career ready military", and to comply with the Veterans Opportunity to Work to Hire Heroes Act of 2011 ("VOW Act"), which requires mandatory participation in all elements of the Transition Assistance Program (TAP), the Navy and Marine Corps are fully engaged in implementation of a redesigned TAP.

The Navy is coordinating with the DOD–VA interagency task force to better prepare sailors and marines to make a successful transition from military to civilian life and Veteran status. All eligible separating servicemembers are required to participate in the TAP program; however, wounded, ill, and injured recovering servicemembers may be exempt from the Department of Labor Employment Workshop, provided they are enrolled in the Education and Employment Initiative (E2I) or a similar transition program intended to improve career readiness.

NAVY AND MARINE CORPS CIVILIAN PERSONNEL WORKFORCE

Question. Section 955 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 required the Secretary of Defense to develop a plan to reduce the size of the civilian personnel workforce by 5 percent over the next 5 years. The plan developed by the Secretary does not meet this objective. Since the time that section 955 was enacted, the Department has implemented hiring freezes and furloughs due to sequestration. As a result, the DOD civilian personnel workforce is substantially smaller than it was when section 955 was enacted or at the time the plan was submitted.

Do you agree that the Navy and Marine Corps civilian employee workforce plays a vital role in the functioning of the Department of the Navy?

Answer. I have made a deliberate effort to understand the critical roles the civilian workforce plays in the Department of the Navy.

Question. Among the Department's 198,000 civilian employees, more than half are engineers, scientists, logisticians, information technology specialists, and acquisition specialists many with critical certifications and advanced degrees. 7,000 are in the medical community, and 35,000 are blue collar artisans. Over 57 percent of the Navy's civilian workforce are veterans and 15–20 percent of new hires are wounded warriors and disabled veterans.

There are civilian career employees in every single State in more than 558 different occupational series across the country helping to solve fleet issues—whether a malfunction in a ship's main propulsion or a combat system out of alignment. Simultaneously, you have hundreds more developing and manufacturing the critical specialty ordnance items and men and women carefully repairing and maintaining our nuclear submarines and ships. They answer the call, 24/7, providing a rapid response to ensure that our warfighters get what they need, when they need it.

Question. Do you agree that if sequestration continues through fiscal year 2014 and beyond, the Navy and Marine Corps will need to further reduce the size of its civilian workforce?

Answer. I expect that will be the case, but I am not equipped with information to respond to that question at this time. At the very least, I would expect continued hiring freezes and potential furloughs to occur.

Question. In your view, would it be preferable for the Navy and Marine Corps to make planned, prioritized reductions to the civilian workforce, or to downsize using arbitrary reductions based on hiring freezes and workforce attrition?

Answer. Given the ever-changing demands on mission, there must be careful consideration of the analysis of the workload with a strategic approach to ultimately create an affordable workforce which still meets the critical demands placed on the workforce.

TACTICAL AVIATION

Question. Several years ago, the Navy and Marine Corps began to integrate their tactical aviation units.

What is your assessment of this initiative?

Answer. I understand that Naval Aviation force projection is accomplished by the balanced integration of Marine Corps tactical aircraft (TACAIR) squadrons into Carrier Air Wings and, when required, Navy squadrons into Marine Aircraft Wings. I believe that the continued integration of Naval Aviation provides the framework for the Navy and Marine Corps to further enhance core combat capabilities to provide a more potent, cohesive fighting force that is sustainable.

Question. The Department of the Navy is facing a potential shortfall of strike fighter aircraft in the next decade even if the Navy continues to buy F–35 Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) aircraft at the rate projected in this year's budget.

What is your assessment of this situation and what actions should the Department of the Navy take to address this potential shortfall?

Answer. I understand that the strike fighter shortfall is projected to fluctuate throughout the next 20 years.

To date, the Department of the Navy has been able to mitigate its shortfall with the successful execution of its Legacy F/A–18 A–D high flight hour inspection and repair program, and a reduced utilization rates across the F/A–18 A–F fleet. The continued efforts of the Navy/Marine Corps team will further define necessary actions required to manage aging F/A–18 A–D aircraft, address discovery of potentially greater than expected fatigue and corrosion, and ensure required availability of aircraft until JSF Fleet Introduction.

The Navy and Marine Corps continue to adjust transition plans as F–35 procurement ramps are flattened. The Marine Corps is taking advantage of higher service life remaining in its AV–8B inventory by delaying the majority of their transitions to the end of the transition plan. This is expected to reduce the demand for F/A–18 A–D in the later years. I believe that sustainment and relevancy funding will be imperative to maintain the requisite operational capability of the AV–8B throughout the 2020s.

Question. What other potential alternatives do you see for maintaining sufficient strike assets if there were any additional slippage in the initial operating capability date for the F–35 Joint Strike Fighter?

Answer. Future delays in the JSF program will make strike fighter inventory management more difficult.

Without additional investments in other strike fighter production lines, the delay of the F–35C or F–35B would make the strike fighter shortfall more difficult to manage potentially resulting in a significant loss of capability that a multi-role mix of fourth- and fifth-generation aircraft provides across the full spectrum of combat operations.

The timely delivery of the JSF is critical to the Department of the Navy's ability to meet operational demands for sea control, expeditionary strike and to establish and maintain a complementary mix of strike fighter aircraft.

SHIPBUILDING PLAN

Question. The Navy annually submits a 30-year shipbuilding plan.

Do you agree that the 30-year shipbuilding plan should, in fact, reflect realistic cost estimates and include all important shipbuilding efforts for that document to be useful for decisionmakers?

Answer. Yes, the 30-year shipbuilding plan should reflect the Navy's best estimate of costs to procure the balanced fleet to meet the Nation's security requirements. The Navy has placed a great emphasis on improving cost performance in shipbuilding through the use of expanded competition, fixed price contracts, and multiyear procurements and block buys. If confirmed as Under Secretary, I would continue to emphasize achieving our affordability goals and providing transparency to Congress on the Navy's progress in achieving those goals.

Question. What level of funding do you think the Navy will need to execute this plan, and considering competing priorities, do you believe this level of funding is realistic?

Answer. I think that the level of funding needed to execute the plan varies each year but averages approximately $16.8 billion per year in fiscal year 2013 constant dollars. I understand that this level of funding is higher than recent historical averages but must be provided to ensure the Navy can procure the vessels to meet the Nation's maritime security requirements. The Defense Strategic Guidance called for a rebalance toward the Asia-Pacific regions, and there has been a renewed focus on naval assets. Secretary Mabus and service leadership have prioritized shipbuilding and those positive trends can be seen in ship procurement and budget requests. I expect that sequestration continues to pose a significant risk to the Navy's ability to purchase the ships needed to execute the strategy. If sequestration or other competing priorities cause the funding levels called for in the shipbuilding plan to not be met, then adjustments to force structure will necessarily have to be evaluated.

Question. Cost growth continues to be a prevalent problem in Navy shipbuilding programs, particularly for the first ships in new classes. Some experts have taken the position that DOD could improve the performance of its acquisition plans by adopting commercial practices, such as: retiring all major risk prior to signing a procurement contract; fixing the cost and delivery date at contract signing; competing all basic and functional design prior to starting construction; and having a disciplined construction process that delivers ships on cost and on schedule.

To what extent should such commercial shipbuilding best practices, and any others you may be aware of, be incorporated into Navy shipbuilding programs?

Answer. Over the past 4 years, I understand that the fleet numbers have stabilized and the primary causes of cost growth have been addressed in the shipbuilding programs. As part of this, commercial shipbuilding's best practices should be exercised to the maximum extent feasible to achieve cost savings in shipbuilding while still meeting military requirements. I understand that the Navy has expanded use of commercial standards in shipbuilding contracts and has aggressively pursued competition wherever possible.

AIRCRAFT CARRIERS

Question. We are now in a 2-year gap between the decommissioning of the USS Enterprise and the availability of a new aircraft carrier, CVN–78 (USS Gerald R. Ford). During this period only 10 aircraft carriers will be operational.

What is your view of the Secretary Gate's plan to permanently change the aircraft carrier force structure to 10 from the current number of 11? Is this still the plan?

Answer. In his recommendations for the fiscal year 2010 budget, Secretary Gates directed a shift in the time between construction starts for Ford-class carriers to 5 years. I believe that rebasing the build rate on 5-year centers provides a more stable and predictable funding plan for carriers, as well as for the other platforms in the Navy's 30-year shipbuilding plan. This restructured procurement plan also enables a steady state force structure of 11 carriers through 2040 by more closely aligning delivery of Ford-class carriers with the notional 50-year service life of the Nimitz-class ship each will replace. I understand that the adjustment to 5-year centers does results in a reduction of the aircraft carrier force structure from 11 to 10 CVNs in 2040 and beyond.

Question. How would the aircraft carrier presence requirements of combatant commanders be met with only 10 operational aircraft carriers?

Answer. Navy would look to balance presence requirements with projected operations and maintenance schedules, similar to what the service has been doing since the inactivation of USS Enterprise (CVN 65) in December 2012. I understand that the Navy has determined the risk to be acceptable, although moderate, during the relatively short period of operating with a 10-carrier fleet between the inactivation of CVN 65 and the commissioning of Gerald R. Ford (CVN 78).

When the force structure is permanently reduced to 10 carriers in 2040, Navy will have to determine how best to mitigate the risks at that time associated with a reduced force and to properly prioritize worldwide presence requirements. While the inherent flexibility provided by the current Fleet Response Plan will enable the Navy's carrier force to meet some emergent demands, it may not be able to meet all of them.

MARINE CORPS GROUND COMBAT VEHICLES

Question. Over the 2 years the Marine Corps has been working on a ground combat vehicle fleet mix study to refine and link its combat vehicle requirements to sealift and ship-to-shore capabilities, and estimate the life-cycle costs of various alternatives in light of the fiscal challenges of the future.

What is your understanding and assessment of the Marine Corps' current and future ground combat vehicle fleet and mix of capabilities?

Answer. I understand that the Marine Corps combat vehicles are at the front end of much needed recapitalization. The Corps' ground combat tactical vehicle strategy includes developing and procuring the Joint Light Tactical Vehicle (JLTV); developing a modern Amphibious Combat Vehicle (ACV); sustaining a portion of the Humvee fleet through 2030; initiating an upgrade program for the legacy assault amphibious vehicle as a bridge to the ACV; and managing procurement of vehicles to reduce acquisition objectives, a net reduction of about 20 percent based on the more recent force structure reviews.

I understand that the JLTV program remains on track with the 2014 budget request continuing development in support of procurement commencing in 2015 though there may be impacts from fiscal year 2014 sequestration.

The Amphibious Combat Vehicle is, as the Commandant stated in testimony earlier this year, a top Marine Corps priority. The execution of amphibious operations requires a self-deploying amphibious vehicle to seamlessly project ready-to-fight Marine units from sea to land in permissive, uncertain, and hostile environments. This capability enables the Corps to maximize available amphibious lift and accelerate the buildup of power ashore, which is key to overcoming access challenges posed by either the lack of improved infrastructure or the threat of an adversary.

The marines are conducting a combined requirements definition feasibility study assembling the best of Government and industry requirements, systems engineering design, and cost experts. The intent is to bring the best talent and best information together to build on the tremendous body of knowledge possessed across all vehicle programs to determine how to deliver the capability needed by the Marine Corps with high confidence in the affordability of the defined requirements.

Question. What, in your view, are the greatest risks, if any, to the readiness of the current fleet and the realization of a modernized fleet sometime in the future?

Answer. Reductions to operations and maintenance funding is directly impacting the Marine Corps near-term forward presence and depot maintenance and training, which will affect future operational rotations, as well as reducing the readiness of non-deployed forces.

In investment accounts, the biggest risk is to future readiness. I understand that the Marine Corps is weighing alternatives to mitigate this through legacy equipment sustainment and bridging efforts, quantity reductions, scheduled delays and the cost impacts to each of its programs.

Question. If confirmed, what would be your role in the oversight of the Marine Corps' combat vehicle modernization program to ensure that requirements are relevant, up-to-date, and stable, and that technologies are achievable and affordable?

Answer. If confirmed, I would continue to emphasize the key lessons the services have learned, which begin with getting requirements appropriately defined and scoped. Affordability targets must be established with an understanding of both opportunity costs and service impacts and must endeavor to hold those targets in a dynamic and uncertain fiscal environment.

RISK IN THE GROUND VEHICLE INDUSTRIAL BASE

Question. Since the cancellation of the Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle in 2011, the USMC's ground equipment modernization program has been restructured to orient on developing a technologically achievable and affordable amphibious combat vehicle, continued development of the Joint Light Tactical Vehicle, while at the same time upgrading or extending the life of current combat and tactical vehicles.

Given the general slowdown of ground vehicle development, procurement, and maintenance programs across the Marine Corps and the Army, what, in your view, are the risks to the combat and tactical vehicle industrial base that could undermine Marine Corps readiness and, if confirmed, what actions, if any, are you taking to manage these risks?

Answer. I understand that the Marine Corps went line by line through their programs to mitigate the effects of the slowdown and sequestration in 2013 recognizing some of the bow wave effects into the out-years.

Delays in the JLTV and the ACV programs are concerning and bear close scrutiny as affordability is a major factor in both of those programs.

The ACV is the Commandant of the Marine Corps number one priority for ground modernization. Of course, this does impact other Marine Corps lift requirements, and that too bears close scrutiny.

The Marine Corps has also developed a bridging strategy until the ACV is able to be fielded, and that is to selectively sustain a number of AAVs, which are in the fleet right now. I understand that these efforts will focus on increasing survivability of the vehicles.

Question. If confirmed, what criteria or indications in the industrial base, if any, will you monitor to alert you to potential or imminent loss of capability or capacity to meet the Marine Corps' needs into the future? How would you propose to respond to evidence of an unacceptable increase in this risk or the imminent loss of capability or capacity?

Answer. Preserving the Ground Vehicle market is very important to ensuring current and future capability for the Marine Corps, but I understand that the Marine Corps is only a small piece of the total Ground Vehicle customer base, with the U.S. Army being the larger part. Because of the cross-service demand for Ground Vehicles, the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manufacturing and Industrial Base Policy (DASD(MIBP)) closely monitors the industrial base.

Maintaining close collaboration with DASD(MIBP) and the other services will be crucial to monitoring and addressing the issues of the supplier base. Many of the critical suppliers are lower tier vendors—in depth monitoring of the supply chain is required to ensure overall health of the market. In the event of imminent loss of essential capability, it may be necessary to employ strategies to preserve key suppliers such as fostering greater Foreign Military Sales volume to partner nations.

NAVY FORCE STRUCTURE

Question. The Chief of Naval Operations has publicly stated that the Navy has a requirement for 306 ships.

Do you agree with this requirement?

Answer. The Navy's plan for a fleet of 306 ships maintains a flexible, balanced force that will prevail in a wide range of combat situations. The fleet is designed to support the current Defense Strategic Guidance and combatant commanders' presence requirements and reflects a reduced number of vessels from the 313 ship plan due to increased forward basing of ships and an increase use of rotating civilian and military crews.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY PROGRAM

Question. Do you believe that the current balance between short- and long-term research is appropriate to meet current and future Department of the Navy needs?

Answer. I have not yet been briefed on the specific long and short-term balance. In principle, however, I believe a robust research and development (R&D) effort that makes the right investments—and not merely investments in science for the sake of science—is vital to the future capability of the Navy and Marine Corps team. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary of the Navy to evaluate the Navy's Science and Technology Program and find the right balance of long and short-term investments for the Departmental R&D program.

Question. If confirmed, what direction would you provide regarding the importance of innovative defense science in meeting Navy and Marine Corps missions?

Answer. The Navy and Marine Corps rely upon the technical superiority of our forces to discourage or destroy our enemies. Our challenge is that the rate of technology change continues to accelerate across the world. If confirmed, I would work with the Secretary of the Navy and the Research, Development, Test, and Evaluation (RDT&E) Corporate Board to ensure the Department of the Navy adequately addresses this critical area. I would also work closely with the Director of DARPA, the Office of Naval Research, industry, and academia to leverage their technology investments.

Question. If confirmed, what guidance would you give to ensure research priorities that will meet the needs of the Navy and Marine Corps in 2020?

Answer. The Department of the Navy RDT&E Corporate Board was established specifically for this purpose. If confirmed, I would use this board to actively engage the Department of the Navy's leadership in defining and setting priorities essential to success.

MILITARY SPACE

Question. Do you believe that the current DOD management structure for space programs sufficiently protects Navy space equities?

Answer. My understanding is that the 2003 designation of the Secretary of the Air Force as the DOD Executive Agent for Space created an overarching DOD space oversight function, allowing the Navy access to critical DOD decisions on major space systems and capabilities. The Defense Space Council, which represents this body, affords the Navy the opportunity to review and participate in a variety of cross-cutting space issues in areas from acquisition oversight to requirements generation to studies and analysis. The Navy also participates in most Major Defense Acquisition Program milestones and Joint Requirements Oversight Council opportunities, providing avenues of influence for all space programs, regardless of service or interagency ownership.

Question. In your view, how actively should the Navy be engaged in the management of space programs?

Answer. Space is increasingly becoming constrained, congested, and contested. I expect the Navy's involvement in the definition, management, and execution of space programs is especially important for a Navy increasingly constrained fiscally while at the same time very much reliant on the global distribution of Positioning, Navigation & Timing, Communications, Missile Warning, Environmental and Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance information provided through space-based systems. Active Navy engagement in space should continue as DOD finds better ways to manage, access, distribute, and utilize information derived from space-based systems and seek to mitigate the challenges to the use of space our adversaries present both now and in the future.

Question. In your view, is the Navy adequately involved in the requirements process for space programs?

Answer. Yes. I understand that the Navy evaluates all capability gaps through internal requirements process as well as existing DOD and Intelligence Community (IC) formal requirements processes.

Question. What is the Navy's appropriate long-term role in space systems, other than as a user of space information and products?

Answer. Space systems are essential to modern warfare and integral to Navy's plans for achieving Information Dominance (ID) through Assured Command and Control, Battlespace Awareness, and Integrated Fires. I understand that Navy is a major user of satellite services and a key consumer of space-derived data within DOD, but most space systems today are acquired and operated by non-Navy organizations, including the U.S. Air Force, the Intelligence Community (IC), the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Agency, and various U.S. and foreign commercial space providers. This unique arrangement requires a continuous and proactive Navy approach to ensure that space systems under development are optimized for maritime operations and able to support current and future Fleet operations. I expect Navy to continue to develop, acquire, and operate narrowband communication satellites for DOD, and maintain a nationally-recognized center for space technology at the Naval Research Lab, supporting Navy, DOD, and IC needs.

INVESTMENT IN INFRASTRUCTURE

Question. Witnesses appearing before the committee in recent years have testified that the Military Services under-invest in their facilities compared to private industry standards. Decades of under-investment in installations has led to increasing backlogs of facility maintenance needs, substandard living and working conditions, and has made it harder for the Services to take advantage of new technologies that could increase productivity.

Do you believe the Department of the Navy is investing enough in its infrastructure? Please explain.

Answer. I believe our supporting systems, including shore infrastructure, are key enablers to executing the Department's warfighting missions. I'm also aware of the fiscal challenges facing the Department. If confirmed, I will look forward to meeting the challenge of balancing the Department's investments across a broad array of requirements to include shore infrastructure.

ACQUISITION ISSUES

Question. What are your views regarding the need to reform the process by which the Department of the Navy acquires major weapons systems? If confirmed, what steps would you recommend to improve that process?

Answer. The Navy has implemented several initiatives to improve the acquisition process. The Navy has improved oversight and reporting with;

- Continuing refinement of Naval Two-Pass/Six-Gate Review process for early and continuous leadership awareness of requirements and affordability in terms of Total Ownership Costs (TOC) throughout the Acquisition process.
- Implement Better Buying 2.0 Initiatives and improved oversight
- Implemented Policy for Should Cost initiatives to be integral to program planning and execution
- Systems Engineering improvement to bring more mature/complete designs prior to MS B which can then be integrated into better requirements for Industry to give better estimate and proposals.
- Developing partnerships with Industry to support the industrial base and secure investment
- Budgeting and Contracting activities to stabilize funding and maximize multi-year procurements where beneficial.

I fully support these efforts and other efforts to ensure a predictable funding profile for programs. This visibility is particularly important with the current strains on budgets.

Question. Department-wide, nearly half of DOD's 95 largest acquisition programs have exceeded the so-called "Nunn-McCurdy" cost growth standards established in section 2433 of title 10, U.S.C. Many of those programs are being executed by the Department of the Navy.

What steps, if any and if confirmed, would you take to address the out-of-control cost growth on the Department of the Navy's major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Many of the oversight and acquisition reform efforts have already bent the curve on the overall performance of our acquisition portfolio. I believe better requirements definition, early design maturity, stable funding are critical. I would continue working with the Warfighter on requirements generation. Navy-Industry teamwork throughout the process is essential.

Question. What principles will guide your thinking on whether to recommend terminating a program that has experienced "critical" cost growth under Nunn-McCurdy?

Answer. A key principle for me is an assessment of whether the existing program is still the best approach to meet the requirement and why we have confidence that the adverse cost growth can be contained? One must cast a critical eye at programs that have not delivered on their promises to the warfighter. I believe in the recertification requirements within Nunn-McCurdy: the program is essential to national security, that no suitable alternative of lesser cost is available, new estimates of total program costs are reasonable, and management structure is (or has been made) adequate to control costs.

Question. Many experts have acknowledged that DOD may have gone too far in reducing its acquisition work force, resulting in undermining of its ability to provide needed oversight in the acquisition process.

Do you agree with this assessment?

Answer. Yes.

Question. If so, what steps do you believe the Department of the Navy should take to address this problem?

Answer. The Navy needs to look at how it recruits, incentivizes and retains our acquisition workforce. For example, the Navy needs to protect and expand the use of the Defense Acquisition Workforce Development Fund. The Office of Personnel Management rules governing recruitment and retention incentives are not flexible enough to maximize the use of Section 852 Incentive funds. Other examples include:

- Lifting the hiring freeze
- Provide entry level hiring flexibility through multiple means of recruitment
- Retired annuitants and Intergovernmental Personnel Act (IPA) programs
- Incorporate changes to expand applicant pool for acquisition workforce personnel opportunities
- Retention incentives in the form of bonuses, post-graduate education opportunities, paying off student loans, etc.
- Recruitment bonuses for interns

- Fund developmental opportunities for mid- or senior-level staff

The vast majority of the contracting commands are seeing an increase in seasoned, experienced personnel retiring. I would expect this to create a tremendous amount of corporate knowledge drain from DoN.

Question. The Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act of 2009 (WSARA) was intended to ensure that future weapon systems move forward on a sound footing by addressing unrealistic program cost and schedule estimates, the absence of clearly defined and stable requirements, the inclusion of immature technologies that unnecessarily raise program costs and delay development and production, and the failure to solidify design and manufacturing processes at appropriate junctures in the development process.

Do you support the approach taken by WSARA?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What additional steps, if any, do you believe the Department of the Navy should take to address these problems?

Answer. In response to WSARA, I understand that it has been beneficial for spurring acquisition reform. The Navy has been engaged in an aggressive review of the acquisition process and overview. Specifically:

I understand that the Navy has improved oversight and reporting with;

- Continuing refinement of Naval Two-Pass/Six-Gate Review process for early and continuous leadership awareness of requirements and affordability in terms of TOCs throughout the acquisition process.
- Implement Better Buying 2.0 Initiatives and improved oversight
- Implemented Policy for Should Cost initiatives to be integral to program planning and execution.

These are not static initiatives and I would agree with their continuation and expansion.

Question. By some estimates, DOD now spends more money every year for the acquisition of services than it does for the acquisition of products, including major weapon systems. Yet, the Department places far less emphasis on staffing, training, and managing the acquisition of services than it does on the acquisition of products.

What steps, if any, do you believe the Navy should take to improve the staffing, training, and management of its acquisition of services?

Answer. The Navy recognizes services contracts are a significant portion of the Navy's acquisition budget. To that end, I understand that the Department is working to reduce its services spending by up to $4 billion in fiscal year 2014, building on the decrease achieved in fiscal year 2013. I consider service contracting to be "Commander's Business" and we must hold all stakeholder's accountable. I expect the Navy will continue its use of Services Requirement Review Boards (also called Services Courts) and accompanying "Tripwires" to better understand our existing efforts, improve future requirements, and help ensure these activities receive appropriate oversight.

Question. Do you think the Navy should develop processes and systems to provide managers with access to information needed to conduct comprehensive spending analyses of services contracts on an ongoing basis?

Answer. Yes. I expect the Navy will continue to support Defense Procurement Acquisition Policy's efforts to deploy a Services Spend Analysis tool based on Federal Procurement Data System-Next Generation data.

UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION ON THE LAW OF THE SEA

Question. The United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS) is currently pending in the Senate.

What are your views on U.S. accession to UNCLOS?

Answer. Nearly every maritime power and all the permanent members of the U.N. Security Council except the United States have ratified the convention. In my view, our absence as a Party weakens our position and impacts our military, diplomatic, and economic efforts worldwide. Only as a Party to the Convention can the United States fully secure its sovereign rights to the vast resources of our continental shelf beyond 200 miles from shore. I strongly support accession to the LOS Convention.

Question. From a national security standpoint, what do you see as the advantages and disadvantages to being a party to UNCLOS?

Answer. I do not see any disadvantages to becoming a Party from a national security standpoint. As a non-party to the Convention, the United States must assert our navigation and overflight rights and high seas freedoms on the basis of customary international law which is more subject to dispute and change than norms established by treaty. Becoming a party to the treaty would give an immediate boost to U.S. credibility as we push back against excessive maritime claims and illegal restrictions on our warships or commercial vessels.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Under Secretary of the Navy?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KIRSTEN E. GILLIBRAND

SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

1. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, you said in your advance policy questions that you fear that if decisions are made by Judge Advocates General (JAG) based on evidence, prosecutions might go down. If commanders push cases forward to court martial based on good order and discipline—with evidence as a secondary concern—is it not likely that the conviction rate will drop?

Dr. ROONEY. Consideration of the evidence is not a secondary concern. Pursuant to 10 U.S.C. section 834 (Article 34 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), a military commander, prior to directing the trial of any charge by a general court-martial, must refer the charge to, and receive the consideration and advice of, a staff judge advocate. Included in this written advice is an assessment of whether the charges and specifications are warranted by the evidence. Commanders do consider the evidence. However, because of the very nature of command, commanders must also consider other factors such as the impact that discipline may have on the future behavior of the unit. Therefore, if the evidence is insufficient to convict the accused at a court-martial or if the victim does not want to cooperate, commanders have other administrative options available to them if warranted by the evidence.

Holding offenders accountable is a priority; and I acknowledge that a higher conviction rate is one factor among many that may increase a victim's confidence in the system and, thereby, his or her propensity to report a sexual assault. This willingness to report is a critical element in addressing the crime of sexual assault. At the same time, however, both to reduce the prevalence of sexual assault and to increase a victim's confidence in the system, we also need to continue focusing significant, widespread energy on changing the culture. It is the relentless pursuit of education and training, coupled with effective leadership from the deckplate up, that will have the most impact on culture and behavioral changes. I believe no single focus, whether prosecution, legislation, or training will be sufficient in and of itself to adequately address this issue. It must be a thoughtful and measured combination of all three.

2. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, please explain, in your view, how a lower conviction rate will improve confidence in the system?

Dr. ROONEY. In my view, victim confidence in the system begins with knowing that unit commanders will respond appropriately. This includes ensuring victims receive the support and services they need and immediately referring all unrestricted reports of sexual assault, and other serious offenses, to the Naval Criminal Investigative Service for an independent and professional investigation. In my view, the important metric in this regard is not just the conviction rate, particularly if it results from fewer prosecutions, but the reporting rates by victims. Other factors that have an important impact on a victim's confidence in the system include adequately protecting the privacy of the victims, regular consultation with victims throughout the process, and ongoing support given to victims including but not limited to expedited transfers, the provision of victim's legal counsel, and the availability of sustained counseling.

3. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, please explain how commanders who are under pressure to push more cases forward to court martial, regardless of whether evidence exists, can make a fair determination on which cases to move forward?

Dr. ROONEY. Commanders are not under pressure to push more cases forward to court-martial. Commanders have been charged with promoting a positive command climate where sexual assaults are not tolerated, preventing sexual assaults from occurring in the first place, and ensuring victims are taken care of when a sexual assault does occur. When it comes to matters of discipline, commanders are to exercise their responsibilities to ensure fairness and justice based on the specific factual circumstances of each individual case.

4. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, if cases are sent to trial based on the good order and discipline of a unit, do you think that maintaining good order and discipline might mean keeping an alleged perpetrator in a unit because he serves an essential function?

Dr. ROONEY. I do not believe that maintaining good order and discipline means keeping an alleged perpetrator in a unit just because he serves an essential function. Good order and discipline includes holding individuals appropriately accountable for their actions, irrespective of whether they serve an essential function. When making decisions about who should remain in or depart from a unit while allegations are under investigation, a primary concern should continue to be the safety and welfare of the alleged victim.

5. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, do you believe that serving in that essential function is more important than justice?

Dr. ROONEY. No. Everyone is replaceable—from the top commanders down the ranks to include those who have special technical skill sets.

6. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, do you believe that allowing sexual predators to remain in the military can be consistent with maintaining good order and discipline?

Dr. ROONEY. Criminal conduct of any kind is not consistent with good order and discipline.

7. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, would it contribute to good order and discipline for a commander to send an innocent servicemember to court martial to prove a point to the rest of the unit as opposed to making the decision based on the evidence and the facts of the case?

Dr. ROONEY. No, doing so would undermine good order and discipline. We must ensure all servicemembers know that our system of justice is fair, effective, and efficient. Furthermore, it would be a violation of the law for a commander to refer a servicemember to court-martial if there was not sufficient evidence to support a prosecution. Under title 10, U.S.C., section 834 (Article 34 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), a military commander, prior to directing the trial of any charge by general court-martial, must refer the charge to, and receive the consideration and advice of, a staff judge advocate. Included in this written advice is an assessment of whether the charges and specifications are warranted by the evidence. Commanders do consider the evidence.

8. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, if evidence is not the only basis for making a decision on the disposition of a case, please explain on what basis commanders should be evaluated on their handling of sexual assault cases. Would commanders be rewarded for sending any case forward even if the evidence suggests that perhaps a crime was not committed?

Dr. ROONEY. Commanders should be and are evaluated on their actions in fostering a command climate that does not tolerate sexual assault and that is conducive to victim reporting and support.

9. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, in your testimony during your nomination hearing in front of the Senate Armed Services Committee you stated that in the Navy, "commanders' ability and result of command and control on command climate is a critical piece that is considered for any promotion or future command." In August, the Navy released public guidance in NAVADMIN 216/13 Navy Performance Evaluation Changes, that officers and enlisted servicemembers must be evaluated based on their contribution to climate in regard to sexual assault. It appears as if this guidance only applies to enlisted sailors and officers of ranks O–6 and below. Is there a separate directive that applies to flag officers? If so, please provide me with a copy of that directive. If not, please explain why one does not exist, whether and how flag officers are evaluated on command climate with regard to sexual assault, and how this position is consistent with keeping flag officers accountable.

Dr. ROONEY. The Navy is committed to accountability for command climate at all pay grades, particularly for flag officers. I am aware that there is a process for evaluating the performance of flag officers but that it differs from the process used for officers in the grade O–6 and below. I am also aware that there is a different process depending on the grade of the flag officer. O–7s receive written fitness reports and the guidance for completing those reports is contained in Bureau of Naval Personnel Instruction 1610.10C, which specifically requires flag officers to demonstrate that they have created or maintained a command climate that does not tolerate discrimination of any kind. In addition to fitness reports, annual command climate surveys are required. The results are shared with the next senior flag officer in the chain of command. While O–8s through O–10s do not receive written fitness reports, they are evaluated personally by the Chief of Naval Operations and annual command climate survey results are fully discussed with the next senior flag officer in their chain of command. Finally, I am aware that the Navy convenes quarterly Sexual Assault Prevention and Response meetings to evaluate trends across the Fleet. These meetings focus on where flag officer leadership is having positive or negative impacts.

10. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, you have served as Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness beginning June 2, 2011 and as Acting Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness from November 2011 to June 2012. This service afforded you the unique opportunity to take concrete measures to address the growing problem of sexual assault in our military. Outside of any initiatives mandated through statutes passed by Congress, or those statutes currently being proposed by Congress in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, please specify what initiatives or programs aimed at reducing the number of sexual assaults and ensuring the effective prosecutions of these types of assaults have you personally played an instrumental role in creating or implementing?

Dr. ROONEY. During my tenure as the Acting Under Secretary of Defense (Personnel and Readiness) the Department implemented a variety of initiatives to change the way we prevent the crime of sexual assault and how we respond when that crime occurs. Those initiatives include the following:

- The Department elevated initial disposition decisions to O–6 level (Colonel or Navy Captain) for cases of rape, sexual assault, forcible sodomy, and attempts.
- The Department launched the Safe Helpline to give victims 24/7 global access to crisis support staff.
- The Department implemented an expedited transfer policy for victims making such a request.
- We implemented a Department of Defense (DOD) policy to retain investigative documentation for 50 years for Unrestricted Reports.
- The Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office expanded its outreach and engagement with experts from advocacy groups, legal, educational and law enforcement communities in order to gain constructive criticism and share best practices.
- We revised the Sexual Assault Forensic Exam kit to improve victim care and align evidence collection with national standards.
- In 2011, we established the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) Integrated Process Team, comprised of senior Office of the Secretary of Defense and Service SAPR program managers, as a standing body that meets regularly to review and advise on SAPR matters.
- The Department expanded SAPR Restricted Reporting support services to include adult military dependents.
- The Department expanded SAPR services during emergency care for DOD civilians stationed overseas and for DOD U.S. citizen contractors in combat areas.

- In January 2012, Military Rule of Evidence 514 was enacted providing protected communications between victims and advocates.
- In April 2012, we added sexual assault questions to DOD Command Climate Surveys and implemented policy to conduct assessments within 120 days for new commanders and annually thereafter.

11. Senator GILLIBRAND. Dr. Rooney, what were the goals and metrics of these initiatives/programs?

Dr. ROONEY. DOD implemented specific initiatives to enhance its efforts to prevent the crime of sexual assault and delineated how all should respond when that crime occurs. The mission is twofold: to reduce the prevalence of sexual assault and to increase official reports of sexual assault. Assessment measures were developed to focus on these two elements. As Department leadership has stated before, one sexual assault is one too many. That goal was the guiding principle throughout the announcement and implementation of these initiatives and also served as the basis for assessing outcomes of programs supporting this target.

The Department uses two specific metrics to assess its efforts in preventing sexual assaults and responding to sexual assault when it does occur. Official reports of sexual assault are entered into the Defense Sexual Assault Incident Database which yields information on actual reports filed. Information derived from the Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members (WGRA) conducted by the Defense Manpower Data Center provides additional data elements. The Department uses findings from the WGRA as a source of information to evaluate prevention and response programs and to assess the gender-relations environment in the Active-Duty Force. The WGRA survey assesses the prevalence of sexual assault and sexual harassment in the Active-Duty Force.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

CIVILIAN AND CONTRACTOR PERSONNEL

12. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) projects the Department of the Navy has overstated its fiscal year 2014 Operation and Maintenance (O&M) budget requirement for civilian personnel by $128 million. What problems does the Navy have with its information technology (IT) systems that preclude an accurate accounting of its civilian personnel?

Dr. ROONEY. methodology in calculating civilian personnel requirements, and therefore with its determination that the requirement is overstated by $128 million. Since the GAO calculates costs based solely on civilians on board at a particular point in time (end strength), the Navy is unable to compare those calculations to pricing, which is based on hours worked (full-time equivalents) and compensation paid for the entire year.

When estimates are submitted for review by the Secretary of Defense, more than a year before the beginning of a new fiscal year, they only reflect any known impacts at the time they are being prepared. The estimates continue to be updated, as new information and new impacts are identified, until the budget is submitted to Congress for approval. In some years, changes occur after the point of submission which may have significant impact on total civilian personnel costs. For example, during fiscal year 2013, a hiring freeze was imposed at the end of January and continued for 8 months through the balance of the fiscal year. While it would seem that a hiring freeze would dramatically reduce funds spent for civilian personnel, the Navy has not found that to be the case. In fact, although the number of people on board has been reduced, compensation costs are slightly higher than planned due to a higher than anticipated number of Voluntary Separation Incentive Payments/Voluntary Early Retirement Authority and lump sum leave payouts. I understand that one effect of the hiring freeze is that the Department will begin the year with fewer civilians on board than planned when the fiscal year 2014 budget was originally submitted to Congress.

Historically, the Navy has had no problems reporting budgeted or actual civilian personnel End Strength and Full-Time Equivalents. I understand that a recent system upgrade resulted in loss of access to actual end strength counts. However, Full-Time Equivalent and Compensation data, used by the Department to track actual costs, is captured in a different system and has remained available throughout this fiscal year.

13. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, if confirmed, what actions will you take to ensure that the Navy's civilian personnel budget requirements in the President's budget submissions will be accurate in the future?

Dr. ROONEY. The Department of the Navy conducts a rigorous budget review prior to submission of the President's budget to Congress each year. Civilian personnel are priced based on prior year execution and any anticipated pay raises for the coming year. Benefits (including health and life insurance, retirement, leave, et cetera) are priced at current rates, and increased costs are specifically excluded from the budget to contain costs and encourage efficiencies. Since the budget review is conducted more than a year ahead of the beginning of the fiscal year, it is impossible to accurately predict and accommodate changes that may affect estimates after the budget has been submitted to Congress. Estimates reflect any known impact at the time cost figures are being prepared. The hiring freeze and 6-day furlough which occurred in fiscal year 2013, as well as the impact of sequestration on the budget, are examples of changes occurring during the execution year of a budget which will likely affect estimates submitted for the next year's budget.

EFFICIENCIES PLAN FOR CIVILIAN AND CONTRACTOR WORK FORCE

14. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, do you support the reduction of Navy civilian and contractor personnel to achieve additional savings in the Navy's O&M budget?

Dr. ROONEY. All expenditures should continue to be examined in light of the need to properly balance all components of the work force to achieve efficient and effective results. Every requirement should continue to be validated and prioritized with budget adjustments made as warranted. This includes labor requirements and associated budgets for the Total Force which is comprised of military, civilian and contractor personnel.

15. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, what percentage reductions in both civilian and contractor personnel end strengths would you support?

Dr. ROONEY. As a result of budget reductions required by the Budget Control Act, I understand that the Department of the Navy is in the process of reviewing and balancing mission capabilities, Total Force (military, civilian, and contractor) manpower requirements and available funding. If confirmed, I support making adjustments to personnel manning levels based on necessary tradeoffs between mission capabilities and funding restrictions rather than a specific percentage target.

16. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, in your view, will the Navy meet the requirement in section 955 to achieve savings in total funding of the civilian and contractor workforce by at least the percentage savings for military personnel over the Future Years Defense Program?

Dr. ROONEY. I understand that the Navy worked with DOD and provided the data required to facilitate the initial "120 day" report in response to section 955. I understand that the Navyhas the capability to manage the workforce to achieve the savings required by section 955.

17. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, if confirmed, will you have the requisite authorities to reduce Navy civilian and contractor personnel?

Dr. ROONEY. The Navy has significant although not unlimited authority to make manpower reductions deemed necessary with appropriate notifications. In the case of Navy civilians, title 10, U.S.C., section 129, allows military departments to make reductions when necessary due to a reduction in funds available. The Budget Control Act represents such a reduction in funds. The Department does not, however, have authority to conduct public/private competitions if they are deemed necessary due to the current moratorium. In the case of contractors, Service Contracts have mechanisms in place which include termination clauses and fixed expiration dates. The Navy is able to make reductions (but not conversions) due to funding limitations or changing mission requirements.

TRICARE FEES

18. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, what is your current position on TRICARE fee increases for working-age military retirees?

Dr. ROONEY. Personnel costs are the fastest-growing part of the overall DOD budget and health care costs are going up at the most dramatic rate in comparison to other personnel costs. As such, I believe that these rising costs need to be mitigated in order for long-term personnel costs to be sustainable. I do support modest TRICARE premium increases for working-age retirees from the military to help maintain a high quality, sustainable benefit package. Even with the proposed increases, working-age military retirees would have one of the most comprehensive health benefits available, while still significantly less expensive than a competing commercial policy.

19. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, why do you think the administration has been unsuccessful convincing Congress to legislate the DOD's fee increase proposals?

Dr. ROONEY. Congress is understandingly reluctant to impose additional costs on military retirees, but the proposals are reasonable in scope, appropriately differentiated through tiers, and necessary for the Department to deliver long-term sustainable health benefits. It is important to recognize that these proposals are largely focused on the retired military population and, even with the proposed increases, the amount of beneficiary cost-sharing remains far below the levels experienced by retirees in the mid-1990s. The TRICARE fee proposals do not affect Active Duty servicemembers, and specifically exempt medically-retired servicemembers and their families, as well as survivors of military members who died on Active Duty. Even with these proposed increases, beneficiaries will continue to have access to one of the most comprehensive and exceptionally affordable health benefits available.

These proposals are important to maintaining our obligations to beneficiaries and ensuring our commitment to improving the long-term fiscal stability of the Military Health System. Under the leadership of the Secretary of Defense, the Military Departments have worked carefully to develop these proposals. Furthermore, the Secretary of Defense has articulated the potential risks to other programs should these proposals not be authorized.

20. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, do you believe that the administration should wait on the Military Compensation and Retirement Commission to report its recommendations before asking Congress to make legislative changes to personnel benefits including health care?

Dr. ROONEY. I support the TRICARE Premium increases for working-age retirees which were first proposed in fiscal year 2012. Even with the proposed increases, working-age military retirees would have one of the most comprehensive health benefits available while still significantly less expensive than a competing commercial policy. I also believe that the Commission will provide other valuable information that can be considered for additional future proposals which may extend beyond health care.

EFFICIENCY EXPERT

21. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, while serving as Principal Under Secretary for Personnel and Readiness, what actions did you take to cut costs in the personnel and readiness portfolio?

Dr. ROONEY. Within the Office of the Under Secretary, I oversaw the identification of cuts in staff and overhead. Through zero-based management reviews, we streamlined operations within our Defense Agency and Field Activities ensuring successful performance of core priorities while reducing overhead. Additional plans were initiated to reduce civilian manning within the immediate headquarters. I oversaw plans for significant reductions in our service support contracts both within the Headquarters and at the field activities. Finally, we initiated plans to reduce advisory studies, eliminated non-essential, lesser-value reports, and initiated efforts to reduce advisory board and commission requirements.

22. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, what efficiencies did you implement and how much did you cut DOD's costs in the role as the Under Secretary?

Dr. ROONEY. In response to fiscal realities our country was facing, I oversaw Personnel and Readiness' participation in a series of efforts to increase efficiencies and reduce overhead expenditures across the Department while maintaining readiness. These efforts covered a broad spectrum of activities falling under the P&R portfolio. In the area of civilian personnel, the Military Services and Defense Agencies were to maintain Department-wide civilian full-time equivalents at fiscal year 2010 authorized levels. Through process improvements and overhead reductions, impacts were to be minimized. Health care reforms were proposed to better manage cost growth, recognize a shared commitment for health care with beneficiaries, and better align the Department with the remainder of the country. We directed significant reductions in both our civilian senior executive servicemembers and general/flag officers across the Department. Where possible we eliminated positions. When necessary and appropriate, we maintained positions, but at a lower level (i.e., GS–15, O–6) which provided cost savings in immediate staffs.

23. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, if confirmed, what will you do to make the Navy more efficient and cost-effective?

Dr. ROONEY. If confirmed, I will continuously strive to assure all organizations and processes are managed as efficiently and effectively as possible. Obtaining a clean financial audit statement for the Department will be a top priority. A major challenge will be to optimize the organization as budgets are reduced in the out years. A major focus will be to avoid across-the-board reductions and focus instead on optimizing organizations, procedures, and processes. An additional focus will be insuring a regular review of new and ongoing contract requirements is undertaken to insure costs are managed in a timely and reasonable manner. Another major focus will be completing the implementation of the Secretary of Defense's efficiency initiatives.

PRIORITIES IN THE NAVY

24. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, how do you characterize the current readiness of the Navy?

Dr. ROONEY. The Department of the Navy remains globally deployed every day, ready to respond to challenges to our national security interests, building cooperation with allies and other potential partner nations, as well as meeting all Operation Enduring Freedom and validated global force management requirements with highly ready forces. I understand that sustaining combat operations for more than a decade has required the use of a large share of the available assets from home bases and stations. The Navy, as the CNO has recently testified, is taking risk in the capacity to surge additional forces forward in response to contingency requirements as a result of funding reductions from sequestration. In addition to the obvious strategic and operational risk, this has a long-term impact on overall readiness that must be resolved. For the Marine Corps, I understand that over half of non-deployed Marine units are experiencing degraded readiness due to portions of their equipment being redistributed to support units deploying forward. I understand that this unbalanced readiness across the force has degraded the Corps' ability to respond to major contingencies within required timelines.

25. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, what trends cause you concern?

Dr. ROONEY. I am most concerned about readiness trends and the impact of operating tempo on personnel.

From a readiness perspective, the most critical concern is the underfunding of readiness accounts that is continuing now into fiscal year 2014, as a result of extended Continuing Resolutions and sequestration. Cuts within the magnitude of a long-term sequestration and/or Continuing Resolutions will have a significant impact on the global security climate, the perceptions of our enemies, and the confidence of our allies.

As a nation we have asked a great deal of the young men and women serving our country over the last 12 years. While proud to answer the call, they have endured shortened turn-around times, double deployments in a single operational cycle, or frequently extended deployments to provide the force levels required. The Navy and Marine Corps team must remain globally deployed to accomplish its mission, but will need to do so in a manner which provides some predictability in the lives of our sailors, marines, and their families.

26. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, are you concerned about the potential of hollow forces in the Navy and Marine Corps?

Dr. ROONEY. I am most concerned about the potential for reduced readiness and the compounding effects which can occur in those circumstances. The Navy and Marine Corps provide the capability to respond to today's crises anywhere in the world. The force is required to maintain high levels of readiness, so they can deploy on short notice and protect our national security. A hollow force cannot be an option.

Our operational readiness is preserved through a careful balance of high quality people, well-trained units, modernized equipment, well-maintained installations, and a force level sufficient to accomplish our many missions. Failure in any one of these pillars of readiness begins to set the conditions for an eventual hollowing of the force. I am specifically concerned about the reduction of Marine Corps end strength and the need for precision in how those reductions are implemented. If confirmed, I will assist the Department of the Navy and work with Congress to ensure we are doing all within our power to execute budget reductions in a manner that avoids hollowing the force.

27. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, do you believe the Department of the Navy has the right funding priorities in place to address these readiness concerns?

Dr. ROONEY. The Secretary has been very clear that his first priority is to sustain a ready force today. In the context of the Budget Control Act's revised discretionary caps and reduced Overseas Contingency Operations accounts, that is the right priority—but the Navy must also continue to build new platforms and modernize existing ones that sustain our asymmetric advantages, as well as our industrial base, to refocus training for future security environments and keep faith with marines, sailors, and their families. I am aware that there are not only direct costs for investments, but opportunity costs. If you spend it on one thing, you can't spend it on another. If confirmed, I look forward to looking into all of our programs to make sure that not only the direct cost, but the opportunity costs are carefully considered in making investment decisions.

MANNING POLICY DURING A SHUTDOWN

28. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, based on your prior service as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, what is your understanding of the current policy during the Government shutdown for the determination of which DOD civilians should be at work and which ones should be furloughed?

Dr. ROONEY. In the case of a government shutdown and absent an express appropriation to the contrary, civilian personnel, and military technicians who are not necessary to carry out or support excepted activities, are to be furloughed. Only the minimum number of civilian employees necessary to carry out excepted activities will be exempted from furlough. Positions that provide direct support to excepted positions may also be deemed excepted if they are critical to performing the excepted activity. Senate confirmed officials appointed by the President are not subject to furlough and their immediate office personnel necessary to support excepted activities may also be considered excepted at the discretion of the appointee. Foreign national employees paid with host country funds are exempt from furlough as are those where our bilateral agreements prohibit furlough.

29. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, during the Government shutdown should shipyards and depots be fully manned and operating?

Dr. ROONEY. Assuming that the question is about public shipyards and depots funded with appropriated funds, only a minimum number of civilian employees necessary to carry out excepted activities would be excepted from furlough. This decision is not discretionary but is controlled by the policy defining excepted activities as well as the use of appropriated funds.

LITTORAL COMBAT SHIP

30. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, we are planning to buy 52 Littoral Combat Ships (LCS) for almost $40 billion with no confirmation of how the ship will be used. Do you share this concern?

Dr. ROONEY. I understand that the concept of operations and design specifications for LCS were developed to meet capability gaps in the areas of Surface Warfare, Mine Counter Measure and Anti-Submarine Warfare with focused mission packages that deploy manned and unmanned vehicles to execute a variety of missions within those broader areas. I also understand that the Navy is in the process of testing and fielding the Mine Counter Measure and Surface Warfare mission packages while the Anti-Submarine Warfare mission package completes its initial development phase. Finally, USS Freedom (LCS 1) is currently deployed to Singapore with a Surface Warfare mission package and the ship is executing its intended mission that includes demonstrating the U.S. commitment to maintain security and stability in the vital Asia-Pacific region. USS Fort Worth (LCS 3) is scheduled to deploy to Singapore in the fall of 2014. Based on this information, I do not share your concern, however I do acknowledge the need to continue to closely monitor both test results and ongoing requirements as additional ships are constructed.

31. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, if confirmed, what would you recommend to address the concerns about capabilities, survivability, manning and sustainment costs regarding LCS?

Dr. ROONEY. I understand that the LCS program is on track to meet all the approved requirements for capability, survivability, manning and sustainment costs. Since the 52 ship LCS program is a key component of the Navy's current and future force, rigorous oversight by me and my staff will continue to be exercised to ensure the program remains on its path to success and meets our Nation's needs. If confirmed, I will ensure Congress is apprised of program progress as future program decisions are made.

AIRCRAFT CARRIERS

32. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, the Department of the Navy recently announced a delay in the award of the design and construction contract for the next aircraft carrier CVN 79 in order to look for ways to reduce costs. This is a good first step in looking for lessons from the first carrier to save taxpayer funds for the next two. Do you support the delay in the award of a construction contract?

Dr. ROONEY. I understand the Navy is negotiating the award of the Detail Design and Construction contract for CVN 79. I also understand that until these negotiations conclude, the Navy intends to extend the current Construction Preparation Contract to authorize planning, material procurement, and discrete work that are aligned with the ship's optimal build plan. This extension should mitigate impacts to the ship's delivery schedule and the industrial base. Continued negotiations on the design contract will afford an opportunity for the shipbuilder to incorporate further construction process improvements into the construction plan. I support this effort to drive affordability into the ship and protect the industrial base.

33. Senator INHOFE. Dr. Rooney, do you believe the Navy can afford an aircraft carrier costing more than $12.8 billion?

Dr. ROONEY. I understand that actions taken by the Navy and the shipbuilder to reverse the trends in cost growth have yielded improved performance on the CVN 78 Program; however, cost growth incurred earlier in the construction of the lead ship could not be undone. In addition, the approach to carrier construction has undergone an extensive affordability review and resulted in changes on CVN 79 that will significantly reduce the cost to build the ship. If confirmed, I will continue efforts to drive cost reductions through lessons learned from the first of class and innovative approaches to carrier construction to reduce the cost to build CVN 79 and beyond.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN

LITTORAL COMBAT SHIP

34. Senator MCCAIN. Dr. Rooney, in response to my questions in the hearing about whether you agree with the GAO recommendation that, "The apparent disconnect between the LCS acquisition strategy and the needs of the end user suggest that a pause is needed." You confirmed the controversy with the program and the need for very stringent requirements, but stated that you were concerned that a pause would cause the costs to go up. Please provide me your description of very stringent requirements you would base future acquisition decisions.

Dr. ROONEY. If confirmed I would ensure future acquisition decisions will be informed by progress to achieve program milestones as well as rigorous analysis of the cost of ships and a "should cost" assessment. Contracts for ships beyond the Block Buy should also be informed by actual cost returns, not estimates, for all ships delivered as well as ships under construction.

35. Senator MCCAIN. Dr. Rooney, if confirmed, would you advocate for continued funding of the LCS if controversy or questions continue to persist about the ship's capabilities?

Dr. ROONEY. If confirmed, I would ensure that prior to moving forward with future major acquisition decisions and the associated funding, that the program continues to demonstrate progress towards meeting the requirements for Initial Operational Capability of each seaframe and associated Mission Packages.

36. Senator MCCAIN. Dr. Rooney, I am extremely concerned that we are planning to buy 52 of these ships for $37 billion with no confirmation of how the ship will be used or to what extent it will satisfy the requirements of combatant commanders. Do you share these concerns?

Dr. ROONEY. I understand that the concept of operations and design specifications for LCS were developed to meet capability gaps in the areas of Surface Warfare, Mine Counter Measure and Anti-Submarine Warfare with focused mission packages that deploy manned and unmanned vehicles to execute a variety of missions within these areas. I further understand that the Navy is in the process of testing and fielding the Mine Counter Measure and Surface Warfare mission packages while the Anti-Submarine Warfare mission package completes its initial development phase. Finally, USS Freedom (LCS 1) is currently deployed to Singapore with a Surface Warfare mission package. The ship is executing its intended mission that includes demonstrating the U.S. commitment to maintain security and stability in the vital Asia-Pacific region. USS Fort Worth (LCS 3) is scheduled to deploy to Singapore in the fall of 2014. Based on this information, I do not share your concern, however I do acknowledge the need to continue to closely monitor both test results and ongoing requirements as additional ships are constructed.

NAVY AUDITABILITY

37. Senator MCCAIN. Dr. Rooney, in your response to written hearing questions, you said you didn't have enough information to say whether the Navy will meet its legal obligation to meet the financial audit deadlines for 2014 to 2017. What is your opinion today?

Dr. ROONEY. Based on the Department's currently favorable risk assessment of the remaining efforts, today I am cautiously optimistic that the Navy will achieve the fiscal year 2014 mandate. A brief summary of the Department of the Navy's progress toward achieving audit readiness on its Statement of Budgetary Activity (SBA) by the end of fiscal year 2014 follows:

- The Marine Corps' portion of this statement has been under audit for several annual cycles, and has made great strides towards obtaining a favorable opinion.
- In addition to the Marine Corps effort, the Navy has asserted audit readiness on seven SBA-related business areas. These areas include: E–2D Advanced Hawkeye Major Defense Acquisition Program (MDAP), Appropriations Received, Civilian Pay, Transportation of People (TOP), Reimbursable Work Orders (RWO), Military Pay, and Fund Balance with Treasury (FBWT). Of these seven, four (E–2D MDAP, Appropriations Received, Civilian Pay, TOP) received favorable opinions after independent examinations were completed on them.
- Exams on two more of these SBA-related areas (RWO, Military Pay) are currently underway, and the Navy expects the third examination (FBWT) to commence soon.
- Three remaining business areas (Contract/Vendor Pay, Requisitioning, and Financial Statement Compilation/Reporting) comprising the SBA are on schedule to be asserted in fiscal year 2014.

38. Senator MCCAIN. Dr. Rooney, can the Navy meet its legal financial audit obligations?

Dr. ROONEY. I am cautiously optimistic that the Department will achieve the fiscal year 2017 mandate of full financial auditability. Reaching audit readiness on the Statement of Budgetary Activity will be a big step toward the fiscal year 2017 goal, and the Navy has a sound approach to known remaining challenges, including: sustaining the auditability gains made so far; strengthening mission essential asset accountability and valuation; and improving the controls in relevant financial systems, including those managed by service providers.

PERSONNEL STRENGTH

39. Senator MCCAIN. Dr. Rooney, last month the GAO provided an analysis of the personnel strength, and the GAO said the Navy "could not provide how many civilians it has as of July 2013, because according to Navy officials there's a problem with its information systems." How many civilian employees does the Department of the Navy have?

Dr. ROONEY. As of the end 30 September 2013, the Navy civilian population was 254,240. This includes 195,665 U.S.-Direct employees, 44,817 Non-appropriated Fund Instrumentality employees and 13,758 Foreign National employees.
